—From the Catholic Review we learn that at the last Consistory Dr. Schulte, of the American College, Rome, published for Pallia for Archbishop Riordan, of San Francisco, and Archbishop Gross, of Oregon City. They were granted. Archbishop Seghers, who lays down the Pallium of Oregon City, has been granted as a personal distinction the Pallium in retiring to his old See of Vancouver's Island. There is a strange and suggestive sentance in the list of the last Consistorial appointments. It notes that on his conversion to Catholicism, the schismatical Bishop Ambergiam, who had arrogated to himself the title of Bishop of Lacedicea, was granted the title of Bishop of Croia, thus recognizing the legitimacy of his consecration, even though it was conferred by schismatics. It will be seen from this, even by Anglicans, that could they show an Apostolic succession their orders would be recognized. Happily, the men who broke away from Catholic unity cared nothing for Apostolical orders. So long as they received the loaves and fishes they were satisfied. Among the appointments by brief, announced at the Consistory, was that of Archbishop Alemany, to the Titular Archiepiscopal See of Tabasium.

Liberal Catholics.

The Lake Shore Visitor, of Erie, Pa., complains that "while much is being done for people, the people in return do very little for themselves. Our religiously inclined to-day, when compared with the many who are bold enough to say that they do not prefer any form of religion, are indeed but few. The churches as a general thing are not well attended, and when the attendance is realized, piety or a sense of religious obligation is not the motive that leads the greatest number. There may be a pew attached to going to church, but certainly church going through an unworthy motive is not praiseworthy, nor is it deserving of reward. There are many who do not attend Mass, who will Sunday after Sunday, perhaps, spend the day in amusement or among companions whose company is not good. If in the evening they can get to church, they go, and perhaps go to any church that suits their fancy. A preacher in the pulpit is about the same on the occasion as Bishop or priest, and the doctrine he preaches just suits their purpose as well. The service is in the evening, and this is all they want. The man who claims to be a Catholic and who has grown so cold as not to see the utility of attending at least at Mass, is a man who will soon take the final step and become an open apostate. He must certainly have lost respect to himself, their churches and schools soon spring up as monuments of their love of religion and education, which are unique. The hierarchy consists of one Archbishop and four Bishops. The priesthood numbers 321 and the missionaries 181, and 305 churches, chapels and stations, and 274 departments of day schools, with accommodation for 45,847 children, of which number 35,620 were present at examination in 1884. The grant earned by these children for that year was £24,773 4s., an Archbishop Alemany's Departure.

In a few days now the connection which has subsisted for the lifetime of a generation between California and its first Archbishop will close forever. Archbishop Alemany all take his departure for Rome in obedience to the call of his superiors, and the revered figure which we have grown to regard as almost an essential part of the Church itself, will be seen no more among us. Although we have been aware for many weeks that his sojourn among us was nearly over, the near approach of his departure cannot but occasion a genuine pang of sorrow to every Catholic heart in California and to many outside the bounds of the Church. It is in the nature of some characters that their full worth and the affection which they inspire are only realized fully when we have to part from them and the gap which they leave in our life is felt at last. They enter so calmly and so unobtrusively into our thoughts and surroundings without jar or tumult, that we scarcely note their presence more than that of the air we breath however largely they may influence our life, and it is only when they are taken away that we can feel how large a place they filled in our hearts.

Such a character is our late Archbishop. For thirty years he has been coming and going among us, ruling the Church in California as the Good Shepherd, as humble as the youngest child. Indefatigable in work, yet never allowing his anxieties and toils to ruffle his uniform serenity, and as sparing of others as he was severe on himself. So congenious has his character been that it scarcely seemed to attract attention, yet if we look on ourselves and the world around us, and even those we are in the habit of looking up to as lofty and noble characters, how few indeed will we find of whom it can be said that during a whole generation of life in a high public station they have given no cause for complaint, for greed, pride or self-seeking, or indulence or self indulgence, or even heatiness of temper, and all this can with perfect confidence be said of our late Archbishop. But this is not all. That a man should devote his life freely to the benefit of his personal friends and family or native land, for no earthly reward would be in itself a rare heroism, but it was not to his own people that Archbishop Alemany's life had been devoted. In the discharge of his high office he has had to deal with men of every race, of every profession, clergy, laity and religious, and among them all he has held the strictest justice, unawayed as far as the human eye can judge by any partiality whatever.

The renunciation of his own will as far as possible seems to have been the guiding spirit of his life. Choosing deliberately a life of poverty and obedience at his entrance into the Order of St. Dominic, he was removed from that obedience and poverty by the express command of the Sovereign Pontiff and ordered to live a ruler of the Church on a distant land. How earnestly he threw himself into his apostolate, how he preached, travelled and discharged the duties of a priest as well as those of the ruler of a diocese we all know. But while so cheerfully bearing the burden of the episcopacy, he has, as far as in him lay, ever retained the life of an humble friar of St. Dominic. Beyond what was the result of the king's nomination of his successor in the same a single dollar from the revenues of the Archdiocese in exchange for the episcopal rule, so now that he returns to seek an asylum of his chosen Order in his old age, he does so in poverty as perfect as when he first took its habit as a Religious.

We feel that it is almost an impertinence to speak of the details of such a life, and we only do so to call the attention of the Catholics of California to note what manner of a man it is that has been guiding them for a third part of a century, and how in our own days and in this healing community the noblest examples may still be found if we will only look for them in serious reflection.

Though Archbishop Alemany has chosen to take an asylum from his old Order as a penitious applicant, it would be a dishonor to the Catholics of California if they did not show at least such a parting gift as would provide for his future maintenance. We have had his toil for thirty three years; should we now suffer a Religious Order to furnish him a gratuitous support in his age, however gladly they offer it? We trust that the liberality of rich and poor will give a sufficient answer to this question before the close of next week, and that California will show herself not ungrateful to her adopted Prelate in his age and glorious poverty.

The Influence of Freemasonry.

The Bishop of Nottingham, in the Nottingham Daily Express, publishes the translation of a passage from a recent number of Le Tonkinois. It is as follows:

"The Prince of Wales, in his character of future Pope of the Anglican Church, earned repeated thanks from our Archbishop, Mgr. Puginier. The Grand Architect is part of the compact. The Prince of Wales is the Grand Master of Freemasonry. He plays no other part therein, and he is the most powerful support of the Grand Orient of France. Hence the Prince of Wales is the Pope of Freemasonry. He is the Pope of the Revolution. Hence of Satan. Hence the Prince of Wales replies the Impure Joseph II. My business is to be a regular pope. And, in this particular situation, he adds: My business is to be Satan."

"But all the Freemasons of England do not feel either the necessity or the dignity attributed to them. They have not all the good fortune of the Prince of Wales for sharing his epithets.

"When Bradlaugh lately came to Paris, he put himself in communication with the Grand Orient of France. He explained to them the necessity of his coming, and that the reasons will be held in London to protect against the desire of the Grand Lodge, and to raise the relations of England with French Masonry.

"The Prince of Wales will be dissatisfied with the Grand Architect. Would he like to offer a piece of good advice, very generous in a republican? Then let him spit himself up on a pitch with the Grand Architect. He is worthy of it."

Mission at the Church of Our Lady of Angels, Los Angeles.

Fathers Cook, who, some three months ago, gave a mission very acceptably at the Cathedral with great success, on the 10th of May, will commence a mission for the Indian speaking Catholics at the Church of our Lady of Angels, opposite the Plaza. He will be accompanied by the well known preacher Rev. Father Gibson, who will preach in English, Father Cook in German and French.

TRUST IN GOD AND DO THE RIGHT.

Courage, brother! do not stumble,
Though thy path is dark as night;
There's a star to guide the humble:
Trust in God and do the right.

Let the road be long and dreary,
And the sky be black with storm,
Foot is steady, strong or weary:
Trust in God and do the right.

Perils lurk and cursing
Paints all that fears the light,
Whether leading whether winding
Trust in God and do the right.

Trust on forms of mighty power,
Plaude that loud like angels delight,
Trust the cyclone, blast of lightning
Trust in God and do the right.

Some will hate thee, some will love thee,
Some will flatter, some will slight;
Some from hate turn with scorn thee,
Trust in God and do the right.

Simple rule and safest guiding,
Inward peace and inward light,
Star upon our path abiding:
Trust in God and do the right.

Household Receipts.

CREAM CAKE.—Three cups of sugar, one cup of butter, rubbed together, two cups of cream, five cups of flour, four eggs, half a teaspoonful of soda, half a glass of wine, and one teaspoonful of any spice you fancy.

COCOANUT CAKE.—Heat to froth two eggs; add gradually a small cup of cocoanut grated, one spoonful of flour; make into cone shape by rolling them. Put on buttered sheets of letter paper, and bake five minutes in a quick oven. Let them cool before removing from the tin.

KISSES.—Whites of two eggs, into which beat very gradually two teaspoonful of powdered sugar and two tablespoonful of corn starch; flavor with lemon or vanilla. Drop in teaspoonful, two inches apart, on well buttered letter-paper; lay the paper on a half-inch board, and place in a moderate oven. Bake fifteen minutes until slightly brown.

A RICH ADDITION TO SOUP.—Beat five eggs well; add to them a pint of best molasses, made from Johnson's fluid beef, or any clear soup you have on hand; stir in some salt and a grain of nutmeg; pour it into a well-buttered pudding mold or tin pan; set this in boiling water and let it boil an hour. Be sure that the water does not flow into the mold. When done cut the mass into thin slices or little pieces and serve in clean soup. Two or three fruit pills may be beaten in the tureen if approved.

SUBSIDED FRUIT CAKE.—The following recipe is from the note-book of a famous Virginia housekeeper: Three pounds of sugar, three pounds of butter, a little over three pounds of flour, twenty four eggs, 6 pounds of currants, two pounds of raisins, chopped fine; one pound of citron, one pound of sweet almonds, blanched and cut thin; one pound of lemon peel; one pound of orange peel; quarter ounce of mace; quarter ounce of nutmeg; a cup of fruit syrup. It will take four hours to bake in a moderate oven. Frost with almond icing.

How to Boil Rice.—An English authority on cooking gives the following as the proper way to boil eggs: Put the eggs into a saucepan, cover them with boiling water and let them stand for about ten minutes when the water will keep hot but not boiling. The proper temperature will be 180° When they are opened the whites will be of a soft jelly-like consistency and the yelk soft but not liquid. It will, in fact, be uniformly cooked, no part of the white appearing raw, as is ordinarily the case in unboiled eggs, but all soft and tender, and yet coagulated.

"A Joke on a Horse.

One of the commission men on Wood bridge street, says the Detroit News, has a horse who was the terror of every pedestrian who got within three feet of his head. The animal has teeth like a shark, and up to a few days ago he'd bite everything within reach except a pile of grindstones. Whipping had no effect, and he would get rid of animals as fast as they were put on. The firm had paid out considerable money to settle for his bites, and were wondering what they would sell him for, when along came a man who guaranteed a cure for Bill. He was told to go to work, and his first move was to get an old suit of clothes and stuff it with straw. The horse was driven down the street, and the cats was tied to a hitching post, back in the street. A full pound of Cayenne pepper was then rubbed into and sprinkled over the garments and the straw stuffing, and the job was ready.

The horse came jogging back, and the driver let him stand within six feet of the man of straw. The old bloke's eye got a twinkle as he saw a fine chance to use his teeth, and he came at full speed to begin edging to the post. When ready for business he made a sudden lunge and snapped the "man" by the collar. That old horse knew a thing or two. He had a mouthful of the pepper in a jiffy. As he lifted the figure off the ground he gave it a shake it fell apart, and he came back with his mouth filled with exploding pepper. Great tears rolled down his long nose, he sneezed and snorted and coughed, and he was just as objectionable as the general laugh on him as a man would have been. He backed away from the remnants, opened his mouth to cool it, and hung his head in shame. He did not even venture for a day, but when he got so that he could look the pelting crowd in the face he was a changed horse. Anybody can pull his ears or rub his nose now with impunity. In fact, he courts caresses where he dodged them, and on the approach of a stranger will shut his eyes and mouth, as if fearful of another dose.

Amusing Blunders.

A schoolboy habit of placing upon a question some literal meaning other than intended by the examiner, often leads to answers as curious as unexpected. Thus an inspector, testing a class upon their knowledge of the economics of the kings of Israel, asked the boy to whose turn it had come to be questioned

"And who came after Solomon?"

"The Queen of Sheba, sir," answered the youngster.

Being asked what were the chief ends of the prophets, a boy replied:

"His head and feet."

A little questioner set to where Jacob was young when he was ten years old, replied: "He was ten years old, sir."

A Concession to the Irish.

LONDON, April 20.—The constituency and the being closed by the Prince of Wales at Sandringham Monday was fully represented. Tuesday by the Duke of Cambridge, who read a letter from the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (which is about to be published in Ireland and the duties transferred to the Secretary of State for Ireland. Several Ministers have been successful in the Irish, one of whose leading complaints has been against the Castle.

The Crimes Act.

LONDON, April 20.—The Cabinet is considering the question of the renewal of the Irish Crimes Act. The Government will make the matter the first business of Parliament after the Easter recess. The Government of Ireland has been in the hands of the Irish Parliamentary party.

The Nations and the Irish Prelates.

ROME, April 20.—The Pope to-day gave separate audiences to the Bishops of Meath and Down, and made arrangements with the Propaganda regarding the Instructions to be sent to the Irish Prelates.

Sentenced Might have paid His Fare Home.

Mrs. Mary Ireland has received another letter from her husband Robert, the American citizen who was lured into Canada, arrested as a deserter from the British army, and released from Sheriffs Castle, penalties, to be this way to America. Hampton.

"The Short Service act has changed the men completely in the Highlands of Scotland and nearly one man that might to have known no war may. I decided to answer my condition that would lacerimate me, and claimed to be an American citizen. I in officer and the Sheriff produce my citizenship papers and said "Are you a British subject." I said "Yes, I have to pay my bill at a hotel while I am in service." The sample of American check made the officer laugh. The officer thought over the matter and decided he no for a long time. Then he said "Sergeant, you had better show Mr. Ireland to the castle gate."

A friendly piper, Archie McCluman, took care of him after to had walked hungry and lonely to Edinburgh.

Nurses for the Wounded.

St. Petersburg, May 1.—Several Society Sisters of Charity have been ordered to join General Komroff's army to aid in caring for the wounded. Of this number thirty will go from St. Petersburg, twenty from Moscow and fifteen from Odessa.

The Council of Irish Bishops.

ROME, April 20.—The Irish Bishops assembled today in the Congregation of the Propaganda. Cardinal Simeoni addressed the Bishops. Their Lordships expressed their determination to treat all questions submitted to them unfettered in any way by political or other feeling.

No News From Middleton.

WYOMING, May 4.—The line is down between Humboldt and Clark's Crossing, Reports of a fight between Indians and the Mounted Police and a white has been heard at Fort Pelly. The dispatches brought by couriers to Humboldt and telegraphed from there today are dated. "Sixty miles south of Gabriel's Crossing." This would place Middleton and Middleton's Indians within miles from Pitt creek. It is known that the column of Middleton was finished on Saturday and is supposed also reached Clark's Crossing before this. This water is constantly rising in the river, which will allow of the stream being used to convey supplies.

The Situation in Sudan.

SUAKIM, April 20.—El Mahdi's power has become more during every day. Last night they attacked Lambkin and Hue and kept up a heavy fire on both sides all night. The firing was heavier, made from too long a range to be effective. Another forward movement by the British troops is expected to take place before long.

LONDON, May 4.—The Portsmouth Street publishes an article by Charles William, a Scottish correspondent, substantially proving the incompetency of Sir Charles William and the social slaughter of Gordon by his negligence. The matter is to be brought up in Parliament the day or two, with the probabilities of a court-martial. Lord Charles Beresford and many ships he orders are willing to be witnesses.

New York, April 18—Last Tuesday an old woman named Sandy died on a small farm in Westchester county. She was supposed to be poor, but her effects were examined today and there were found sewed up in an old petticoat $20,000 in greenbacks, bank books showing deposits of $19,000 and $10,000 in bonds. In addition to this she owned the farm on which she lived, and the house was filled with the farm upon which she resided. The bulk of the estate will go to the will go to her nephew, Mortimer Brown of this city, James and William Sandy, and a considerable number of others.

Monsignor Capel's Status.

BOSTON (Mass), April 24.—The following telegram was received by the Boston Globe to-night from Monsignor Capel:

MONTREAL (Tues.), April 23.—The Globe has very falsely published some correspondence concerning myself, to which I say you publish the following denial:

I, Lavoie had the honor to serve as private chaplain to the house of Pius IX.

I have never had a recognized place in European politics.

I never had the honor to be under the direction of Cardinal Nawman, or of being associated in any work with him.

My revenues from the Kensington Episcopal College was my own voluntary act of generosity.

My visit to the United States is of my own choice, and for what I had long decided.

Save in four instances all my lectures and sermons have been delivered at the express invitation of priests, bishops and archbishops, who have given me the hearliest welcome.

Many of such discourses have been given gratuitously, and in many where payment had been made the larger portion of the net proceeds has gone to the need of the local church or institution.

In the month I am, at the request of the ecclesiastical authorities, lecturing and preaching in the churches.

Lastly, I am pursuing, but more carefully and slowly than I had ever intended, the plan of visiting all the great centres of American life. This I shall have fairly well done. The South I am now doing. Also at immediately I shall visit the Pacific Slope and afterwards the Canadian States.

THE AFGHAN DISPUTE.

The Recent Difficulties to be Arbitrarily Settled.

LONDON, May 4.—In the House of Lords this afternoon Granville in reply to inquiries said that England and Russia had agreed to renew negotiations in London concerning the Afghan frontier question and that a meeting of the Ministers of Russia and England would be held. He believed and that both England and Russia had agreed that the difficulties which had arisen from the Penjdeh incident should be submitted to a full investigation and reference to a friendly Power.

LONDON, May 4. The Government has sent orders to Devonshire to make shortening sailor of small pattern for transport service. This, it is believed, foreshadows the shipping of all war preparations.

THE TROUBLE IN INDIA.

CALCUTTA, May 4.—The public is dissatisfied with Ripon's concessions to Gladstone, and there are rumoring expressed now that Ripon's attitude may have already endangered the safety of the party comprising the Lansdowne Surveying Commission. Preparations for war on a large scale still continue in India.

CONVERSIONS IN GERMANY.

Remarkable Conversions Among the German Princes.

The St. James Gazette of London calls attention to the fact that Catholicism has of late been making progress among the Princes of Germany. Duke Philip of Wurtemberg, the only Protestant Prince of Germany, has recently announced his conversion to Catholicism, and the eldest daughter of Duke Philip by his wife, Princess Ida of Schaumburg-Lippe, is to be married to the Prince Regent of Bavaria, with the probabilities of a court-martial. Lord Charles Beresford and many ships he orders are willing to be witnesses.

New York, April 18.—Last Tuesday an old woman named Sandy died on a small farm in Westchester county. She was supposed to be poor, but her effects were examined today and there were found sewed up in an old petticoat $20,000 in greenbacks, bank books showing deposits of $19,000 and $10,000 in bonds. In addition to this she owned the farm on which she lived, and the house was filled with the farm upon which she resided. The bulk of the estate will go to the will go to her nephew, Mortimer Brown of this city, James and William Sandy, and a considerable number of others.

THE WEEK'S NEWS

FROM

IRISH NEWS BY MAIL.

Auction.—In the Belfast Police Court, on April 9, John Green, tramway conductor, was charged with having assaulted Mr. Thomas Gibson, a gentleman of the city of Ireland in a shop. Gibson and killed by a passing tramcar in Donegal Place. Several witnesses having been examined, the judge said that in his opinion, a prima facie case had been made out that the prisoner was guilty of negligence, and he would therefore be discharged.

Armagh.—The Most Rev. Dr. McGettigan, Primate of all Ireland, has offered cattle received from the sexes attack of Disease which took alarming a time a couple of weeks ago. He thinks it will cure some time, but the worst symptoms have entirely disappeared. A trial was still, in a hopeful, completely cured, perfect unrelated Profits, and enable him to continue the treatment of the cattle. The Primate is a great favorite with the people, and the sympathy expressed in the case with which the attachment of his flock was received and the universal sympathy felt.

Clare.—Mr. John Mahony, postmaster, Kildysart, has been recently appointed clerk of petty sessions for the Kildysart district. The appointment of Mr. Mahony to this position has, I might say, given great satisfaction to a large circle of friends in the locality. In addition to this, Mr. Mahony has for some time back been appointed agent to the various lines of emigrant steamers plying between Ireland and Australia.

Mayo.—Mr. D. Hill, V.S., has been elected veterinary inspector for the district of Ballinrobe, in place of the late lamented Mr. Patrick D. Nevin. Mr. Hill is a native of Ballinrobe, and a large number of relatives and friends of the deceased, assembled in Kilduff cemetery on the day of the interment to mark a mournful and sudden, just tended to the last sad rites to the remains of the deceased. Mr. Hill is a young man, and is universally popular. His house has also been selected by the Lord Lieutenant for the Chancellor, in room of the late Thos. Mason, who resigned the position a long time ago

Poetry

THE TWO ANGELS.

FROM THE FRENCH.

When a dear child is born upon the earth,
God finds before him a minister of love;
Sweet, gentle spirits, predestined by his birth,
One, in his world, and one, in heaven above.

One pleadeth for him, near the Father's throne;
The other visibly takes his delegate;
And both, joy-long to aid him their care,
Shed wisdom's light around his innocence.

One angel, guardian of his happiness,
Asks him for incense, whiter than the lily,
The other, kind and modest as a nurse,
Asks him for love, both blessing in return.

And when his little hands are held so fit,
Calling on God, one sound smiles on high;
And when the other feels the pressure soft
Of his sweet mouth, tears fill her raptured eye.

But if alas! burdening himself with care,
He sins in joy, and forgetteth his God,
Both fly to bring back peace, one by a prayer;
The other, by the pardon of her heart.

And when, on each, sorrow lays its one yoke,
Of all time's trials, he most comes for lay;
One doth protect him with his power divine,
The other, with her heart's fidelity.

Blest heavy children! may your voices clear,
In pious accents, sound, and lid adore;
Who, in a world, gives an angel here
And then, in heaven above, one equal more.

THE BRIDGE OF PRAYER.

BY ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

The bridge of prayer, from heavenly heights suspended,
Unlike his earth with spirit realms in space;
The interests of the material world are blended
For those whose feet have turn often toward that place.

In troubled nights of sorrow and suffering
When joy and hope seem sank in dark despair,
We still may see the shadows clinging
The gleaming archway of the bridge of prayer.

From that fair height our souls may lean and hear
Tones of world music, from the fathers above,
And through the vapors obscuring our dear eyes
Of loved ones who have hastened on before,
And angels come from that celestial city
And meet us half-way on the bridge of prayer.
God sends his angels to the bridge of prayer
To strengthen us for burdens we must bear.

O you whose feet walk in some shadowed by way
Far from the main road of pleasure and delight,
Still love to hear the joyful responsive hallway,
Where heavenly glories upon the night.
And sometimes pulse of joy grows universal,
And happiness walks hand in hand with pain,
Then the bridge of prayer is crowded with people
For those who often seek the bridge of prayer.

The Beechams.

A BEAUTIFUL CATHOLIC STORY IN NINE CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER VIII.

Some days after the funeral Sister Clare was announced to the parlor, and she was greatly surprised to meet her brother. His manner was in bright and joyous, and he greeted her so cryly, that she trembled at the thought that he was about to break the news he was so little expecting.

"What a quiet sun you have grown, Gertrude, I doubt if you recognize Jack."

He did not give her time to reply as he wrung her hand and continued in a merry way: "And my dear Nell! How is she? And Maurice, too, my old friend! How I long to see them both! I was on my way to Fernley, but I turned out of it, to give my sister news of her brother Jack. He passed for the first time, and seeing her ready to receive, I thought I would call. Well, Gertrude, cannot this fit, Jack," she replied, in a tone of wonder, "but I see that it is impossible that you have received any letters. "I have been travelling from one place to another during the past two months, and though I left directions to have my letters forwarded, I believe many have gone astray. I see, Gertrude, there is bad news. What is it?"

"Jack, you must prepare yourself for a heavy stroke. You cannot expect to meet Maurice by the time you reach Fernley."

"He is then dead?" Perhaps—and here he paused, afraid to utter the thought.

"Yes," she answered, "he is dead."

He was silent at first, and then very sadly said: "Tell me of his death. I am sure he made a happy end, his life was all a ways, so good. You know we lived as brothers, and I blamed, I may say, his very thoughts."

"Ah, Jack, he was good, open. She then related the end of their unhappy brother-in-law.

Dreadfully shocked, he did not speak for some time. At length he exclaimed:

"Oh, such a death! I will not place relations on the virtue of any one again."

"We cannot place such firm reliance on human virtue. Any one of us, from little and little, may fall into great sin. We must doubts in ourselves and trustin God," she replied.

"You have answered my thoughts at this moment. I was going to say I does not trust myself."

"Indeed, Jack, you might well say that. But whilst we are diffident of ourselves, let us remember we can do all things in Him Who strengthens us. Let us, therefore, in temptation let us have recourse to prayer and grace will not be denied."

"And my Nellie, what of her?"

"Jack, she is at peace—at rest."

"Dead! Oh, my God! he cried, breathlessly. "Oh, do not say she is also dead!"

"She is with her God, Jack. She died a most holy death, three days ago."

"And I am too late. It is more than I can bear."

Sister Clare did not again speak. Jack had sunk on his knees, and buried his face in his hands, and she judged it best to leave him so. After some time she added that he would like to visit the little church, which was attached to the convent. As he was opening the door he said, "I will come again in morning, Gertrude. I will not keep you longer this evening."

She left him, therefore, inwardly praying that the God of all comfort would deign to give him great grace for the heavy cross he was now suffering. The following day he asked her for the remainder of his sister's history.

CHAPTER IX.

Some weeks after, Jack Beecham proceeded to Nuremberg, with the intention of studying some paintings.

One evening he had been visiting the Church of St. Lorenz, and as he was strolling from the Karlstrom Strasse he met Giovanni Bernini, a gentleman, with whom he had become acquainted a year before at Milan. Giovanni appeared to be painfully absorbed in contemplation, and Mr. Beecham, guessing his sorrow, expressed his sentiment at their meeting, and begged he would accompany him on the morrow to the Mutte Kappelle.

Bernini shook his head vacantly, and replied, "I have no heart to hear a strange lip palette and brush."

"And why so?" inquired young Beecham.

"Because my heart is full of sorrow and uneasiness, and my hand is too unsteady."

To Jack's interrogations, as to the cause, he replied, "I have a young brother, over whom, since my parents' death, I have watched as a father. He has great great promise of rising to fame by his talent. But alas! he has begun to indulge in gambling and intemperance. It is but a short time since I followed him into a house where a game was just ended. I may say that, unfortunately, he has been the winner, for now he will be induced to continue the course he has begun. I succeeded in drawing him away and taking him home. In turning from the table, I observed that his opponent in the game sat on in a dark and vengeful scowl, which meant mischief."

It was late when they parted, and they threading their way through some narrow and irregular streets of the town, not noticing the lofty and old houses on either side, which at another time would have attracted their attention.

So absorbed were they in conversation that they did not observe that their steps were slowly dogged. Jack, happening to stop his cane, perceived a tall figure in mounting them. At first he did not pay much attention to the fact, but after they had proceeded some distance, by an uncontrollable impulse, he was induced to look behind, and then noticed that the same man was still keeping upon their footsteps. Jack, who was not at all timorous, began to feel uneasy, when he, for the first time, remarked that they had lost their way. They had now reached the river side, at a dark and lonely part of the street when, suddenly, Giovanni was seized. Jack made an effort to go to his assistance, but he received a blow upon his head which left some less to the ground.

When young Beecham next opened his eyes, he became aware by the jolting and moving over the stones, that he was in some vehicle. He whether he was going, and whether he was with friends or enemies, were questions he could not satisfactorily answer. He could not see; and, on making an effort to rise, he learned to his cost, powerlessness he was. The pain in his head was great, and he remed his hands and to find that it was bandaged. He tried to recollect what had happened, but in vain, and once more relapsed into a stupor.

On again recovering consciousness, he found himself in bed, but he did not recognize any of the surroundings. He might have lain there for years, so lapsed was all idea of time to him. Once more he fell into a deep sleep, from which he awoke to find a physician by his side.

"The doctor thinks him better to-day, and some persons want to see him.

"Yet, he has been now five days and so yet he has been on the verge of consciousness," rejoined the low voice of a nun.

"Where am I?" said Jack, opening his eyes and looking vacantly.

"Thank God, he speaks!"

The house of the voice seemed to Jack to echo some faint memory of the past, and "Where am I? Who are you?" he again asked, turning his gaze full upon the speaker. It was the nun, whom he had observed following him in the streets, when in the company of Giovanni Bernini. Mingled feelings of terror and indignation seized him. The other seemed to read his thoughts, and said, in what sounded to Jack a feeble voice, "You have nothing to fear from me. You are with friends."

With enemies, Jack was on the point of replying, indignantly, but there was in the gaze of the speaker a look of such kindness and interest, that he forebore. He scarcely recognized the countenance as that of the man who was the cause of his accident, and he fixed his glance with curiosity and wonder once more upon the face.

"Jack, do you not know me?"

The voice, the face recalled Richard to his memory, and he said, hesitatingly, "I should say it was my brother, if I did not know him to be already dead."

"And why do you say that Richard Beecham is dead?"

"We received certain intimation that my brother was drowned years ago. But how comes it that you know that name and mine?"

As Carl told the reason of his misfortune, Richard was making various plans, which, however, he did not communicate to his old friend. He merely remarked, "I will be here again early to morrow with my brother, and we will see if anything can be done."

That night he and Jack set up late revolving plans for the future. Jack proposed that if Carl were willing to accept it he would go to his aid with his fortune, and be sleeping partner, which Richard and Carl in conjunction should be the practical one.

Carl was overwhelmed with surprise and joy at the unexpected news, and once more he knelt at Beecham's feet.

Between the friends was still further cemented by the marriage of John Beecham and Rosanina Buhler, a sister of Carl's, and the latter became a Protestant.

Here, then, we will part with the Beechams, with the hope that future generations may enjoy every happiness, and in particular that they may be preserved from the baneful influence of accursed drink. With regard to the further, wild father can we say than, may he continue to run his course with an earnestness in the pursuit of the object after which he is, or rather surpass, the obstinacy with which he pursued the path of error.

[THE END.]

Irish Emigration.

In the decennial period ending in 1861 the population of Ireland was found to have diminished by 20 per cent. In the next succeeding decade a further decrease took place of close upon 12 per cent. A still further diminution of nearly 7 per cent. occurred in the last decennial period, ending in 1871, so that in thirty years the population of Ireland had fallen from 8,175,124 to 5,412,377; while during the same time in England and Wales the population increased from 16,000,000 to 22,000,000, and in Scotland from 2,620,000 to 3,360,000 In 1841 the population was 8,222,664 in round numbers, and it was estimated to be 4,962,570 on the 31st of December, 1881. In 40 years, therefore, the Irish people have suffered a diminution of somewhere amounting to 3,192,784, each succeeding year adding to the total by showing a stricken lessening of the population, and at the present moment we have touched a lower level than at any time since the Union. Although the Irish people are being constantly quoted, and are familiar to everyone, they deserve none the less to be again repeated, as a perpetual reminder of the fact that, while other countries

"Journalism is the greatest social power, because it is the social power in popularizing every day, upon the world, constitutes opinion, and opinion governs the world. Journalism is the greatest power in the world, it sweeps and sways everything, and yet it is wielded powerless in our midst, as if it were not, as it is, the greatest power in the world. Catholics have been lulled to sweet repose and defeated like sheep, while wolves have prowled in the fold. Journalism—the Press, Thunderer, Mouthpiece, Tribune, Herald—Big Gun! Issues and direct strength that determination or the reverse of determination, based upon premises which are in effect, the opinions of Catholic journals who defend Right and Truth, and who, with the sword of the Spirit, slay error, lies and delusion—the Press, the Sword and Buckler—Hear it!"

Editorial Notes.

— Mr. Thomas Brennan, the well known ex-Secretary of the Irish National Land League, now a resident in Detroit, Mich., has been admitted to practice in the Wayne circuit and United States Courts.

— The Western Watchman says that a new See is to be established in Illinois, to comprise all that part of the State south of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. Rev. W. Clune of St. Boniface's Church, German town, Ill., is mentioned as the probable Bishop of this new See.

— An Argentine exchange states that he Holmnos has resolved to raise to the dignity of the Cardinalate the Most Rev. Dr. Paul, Archbishop of Bogota. If the news be true, Archbishop Paul will be the first South-American who has ever received that honor.

— Baroness Brothem informs us that a learned priest having suggested the need of an explanation of the Catechism of Christian Doctrine ordered by the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore, they have succeeded in getting Rev. Louis A. Lambert, author of "Notes on Ingersoll," to undertake such work.

— It is being quietly talked over that at an early day an assistant to the Most Rev. Archbishop Feehan of Chicago will be appointed, and the ultimate division of the diocese is also being predicted. The diocese is one of the largest in this country, and, with a rapid increase of work, the field is regarded by many prominent Catholics as needing an assistant to the Bishop in charge at once.

— Mr. Charles Dawson, M. P., the apostle of the Irish Popular Franchise, has won another signal victory in securing the passage of the Municipal Voters' Relief Act with a clause which, reducing the time of residence qualification from two years and eight months to 12 months, increases the number of voting inhabitant householders in Dublin from 7,000 to 20,000. This will give the Nationalists a large majority throughout the city, and will put the popular's representatives into the Municipal Council. It is the death knell of Toryism in Dublin.

— Archbishop Croke recently had an audience with the Holy Father at the Vatican. Pope Leo XIII. Offer avoided politics, but expressed the hope that the Irish Bishops would feel it their chief duty to tighten the bonds uniting the Holy See with the Irish people. The Holy Father added: "I have your great personal influence and I am glad of having the opportunity of expressing all the confidence that our spectator is heart feels in your pastoral zeal and prudence." The Archbishop's audience lasted twenty minutes.

— The London Tablet brands as a falsehood the statement recently telegraphed here from Rome that a projected visit of Cardinal Manning to the Eternal City had to be postponed "because his presence there would be disagreeable to the Irish Bishops." As a matter of fact, Cardinal Manning did not at any time contemplate a visit to Rome this Spring; and as for the other statement, it is sufficiently refuted by the fact that in addition to Archbishop Croke, five other Irish Prelates, while in London on their way to Rome, visited his Eminence and were most cordially received by him at his house in Westminster. These were the Archbishop of Tuam, the Bishops of Elphin, Ardagh, and Galway, and the Coadjutor Bishop of Kildare and Leighlin.

— The annual meeting of the Irish Catholic Colonization Association, was held at the Grand Pacific Hotel, Chicago, on the 5th inst. Bishop J. L. Spalding, of Peoria, presided. Among those present were Bishop Spalding and Ireland, Rev. Fathers McGlerick, of Minneapolis, and D. J. Riordan; General John Lawler, of Prairie du Chien, Wis.; W. J. Onahan, John Fitzgerald, of Lincoln, Neb.; Anthony Kelly of Minneapolis, W. J. Tuan, and P. J. Healy. W. J. Onahan, secretary, reported the assets of the association to be $100,000; liabilities, $75,000; surplus, $25,000. The stock retired during the year was $17,000, and about $20,000 additional stock will be retired during the present year. The reports from Nebraska and Minnesota are very encouraging, showing that 1,000 families were at present enclosed in the two States.

— The Rev. Mother Mary Jerome Ely, Superior General of the Order of Sisters of Charity, died after a long illness at the Convent of Mount St. Vincent on the Hudson, on Gideon, April 29. Mother Jerome was born in Baltimore, Md., in 1810, and came from a distinguished Southern family. At the age of seventeen years she became a novice in the Catholic faith, and soon entered the Order, of which she has been for so many years the director and manager. When first transferred to New York the convent of Mother Angelica, sister of Archbishop Hughes, in charge of St. Vincent's Hospital. Afterward she purchased the property of the tragedian, Edwin Forrest, and became the director of the convent that under her management has obtained its present widely extended reputation. She was buried on Friday. Her niece is a Nun at St. Peter's, Barclay street, New York. R. I. P.

The Situation in Ireland.

One is almost tempted to feel something like pity for Mr. Gladstone in the constant humiliations which have been heaped on him, as head of the British Government, during the last few weeks. Russia has been submitted to unconditionally; the Khartoum expedition after an expenditure of twenty-five million dollars, is slowly returning from the land of the Mahdi leaving the prestate in undisturbed possession; the attempt to force French citizens in Egypt, in the name of the Khedive, has had to be apologized for, and now the illstarred statesman finds himself engaged in a bitter struggle with the Irish Parliamentary Party from which he can hardly expect anything but fresh humiliations. The Coercion Act of 1882, which placed the liberty of the Irish people practically at the will of the Lord Lieutenant, expires by limitation with next August. To pass it in face of the Irish opposition occupied three months of Parliament during the former year, and so far it has utterly failed to strengthen in any way the power of the Government in Ireland. It has served to exasperate, not to daunt or crush the national feelings of the Irish people, and to allow it to lapse would be a virtual confession that the policy of ruling Ireland by force has been an utter failure, while an attempt at renewing it will only heat the national spirit of hatred to England to an unknown intensity at a moment when the safety of the Empire is being rudely endangered by foreign foes.

Two courses are now open to the English ministry, this is the full concession of its own Government to the Irish people, which might possibly allay their hostility to the Empire at least in so far as to make them passive bystanders in the coming troubles, and the other is to pile on fatile coercion as already the case. The refusal of the Limerick corporation to pay the arbitrary police tax levied on them by Lord Spencer, and the defiance of the fines for contempt of court made by Mr. O'Brien during the recent trials, have shown the importance of the Viceroy to use the powers conferred on him, and however ferocious the Acts of Parliament may be they will have to deal with the same obstacle of the powerlessness of the Executive in the face of a united people; nor whether the renewal of the Coercion Acts will be vigorously fought against in Parliament, and any violent measures against the Irish representatives will only bring more prominently before the rivals of England the bitter dissatisfaction to the Empire which exists among so large a section of her nominal subjects.

The lesson of Sadowa in 1866, when the Austrian military power collapsed so much from the dissatisfaction of Hungary as from the arrogance of Prussia, is still fresh in the memory of European statesmen and it will not be forgotten in gauging the power of England to any foreign contest. To say that power would be a serious matter, but to one like England which depends mainly on former prestige for its position as a great nation, the well known hostility of a large portion of its population may easily be now fighting for them and say day may bring the difficulties of England to such a point that she will be forced to withdraw her troops from Ireland for her own defence. In such a contingency we may be sure there would be none of the fawning in favor of the "golden link of the crown" which kept the volunteers of 1782 from breaking their connection with England. "Everything comes to him who wants," says an Italian proverb, and Coercion or no Coercion the Irish people can now cheerfully await the coming time when they will have their own again.

Irish Bishops in Rome.

A well-informed correspondent at Rome telegraphs that the Irish Bishops have held two informal meetings of the Irish college. The last was held recently and was important. Bishop Woodlock, of Armagh, his coadjutor, and the Bishop of Clonfert was absent. The schema to be discussed by the congress resembles notably the schema submitted to the American Bishops in 1882. It opens with a touching eulogy of the faith and proselytizing zeal of the Irish race. The epistle is divided, treating the ecclesiastical spirit by occasional resets to Rome in pointed text and shown by quotations from the New Testament. The points of greatest interest are those relating to the moral life of Catholics and the attitude which the clergy should adopt toward secret and revolutionary societies. All the rules of the Propaganda against secret societies are still in force, and all adherents to societies are condemned (omnes sectarii damnamus).

It is believed that Archbishop Croke will quote the case of Poland and the doctrine of St. Thomas Aquinas as proofs that if some revolutions are forbidden others are permitted. Bishops are exhorted not to allow revolutionary doctrines to lead astray the generous and ardent imaginations of youth. The conduct of Bishops and the higher clergy in their dealings with the civil authorities has a prominent place in the schema, reference being made to the "splendid example" (insigne exemplum) of religious tolerance set by England in her colonies, an example worthy of imitation by some other powers which only remember Catholics when something is to be got out of them. The Bishops are authoritatively reminded that the general principles which guide the Vicar of Christ (per totat orbem indicium omnium ordinarium) cannot be altered, and that the salvation of souls, the peace and prosperity of Christendom, and the good of the greatest number should be the constant object of the Church.

— The old Fresh Pond hotel property in Cambridge, Mass., has been sold to an educational society of Catholics, which will at once convert the building into a convent school. The hotel was first opened to the public in 1797, and for years was a popular road house, many organizations choosing it as the place for their annual gatherings. It occupies one of the most elegant sites within twenty miles of Boston.

The Egis of Great Britain.

An item in the recent telegrams from London is the effect that a large tribe of Arabs near Suakim were ready to submit to the English invaders, but feared to do so lest they should be abandoned to the vengeance of their countrymen, throws a strange light on the theory that the power of the British Empire is always ready to protect its subjects in every quarter of the globe. Not a few intelligent Americans are ready to believe that it is a cardinal principle of English policy to support English subjects at any cost wherever they get into trouble in foreign lands. The idea has been assiduously fostered by the English press and its American cognate, and has contributed a warm acceptance even in this country. It is common to have parallels drawn between the condition of the American citizen abroad and a British subject in the same condition, in which the latter is represented as occupying an entirely superior position in the case of any difficulty arising with the local authorities. Like many other theories, however, this of the immunity of British subjects flags, forsaken when they go abroad, will hardly stand the test of experience.

The Arabs around Suakim—if we may credit the English press—are willing to become subjects of the Queen if only they can be afforded protection for their lives, but it is definitely acknowledged that the might of the Empire is unable to protect them. The story is by no means a new one in spite of the vaporing of English writers. It was only last year that the crew of an English steamer which had been wrecked on the coast of Sumatra had been ransomed from the Rajah of Acheen after a long captivity, during which he had contented himself with attempts to bully that potentate into fear of the British ironclads which never came to the rescue of their countrymen. The expedition sent to Abyssinia a few years ago by Disraeli for the rescue of some Englishmen, has been often alleged as a specimen of the manner in which the whole power of the Empire is habitually put forth whenever an English man gets into trouble abroad, but as a matter of fact the expedition proved altogether too costly to be repeated. It may not be generally known that Lord Granville, the present English Foreign Minister as lately as 1880 sent a circular to the British diplomatic agents abroad warning them that no money was to be expended on any account, even by the way of loan, for the rescue of British subjects who might get into trouble with the native populations in semi-civilized lands. The ransom of Colonel Sprague from Turkish brigands, and one or two similar cases had wholly cooled the ardor of the British Jingoes for the protection of their country men abroad, and the Government has since steadfastly adhered to the rule that English travellers must look out for themselves.

This may be news to some Americans, but it is the simple fact. The abandonment of the renegade Arabs in Northern of the Afghans in Asia after British protection had been pledged to them, are only other instances of the value of the much boasted omnipotence of England. If loud talk and threats can do, the business, then but once a power, even such as Osman Digna or the Rajah of Acheen, declines to be overawed by proclamations the subjects of the British Empire, native or foreign, are left to their fate. Recent events have pricked the bubble of British influence abroad in a way which the dullest cannot misunderstand, and for the future no British its value will be correctly appreciated in every land.

Influential Irishmen in Japan and China.

Irishmen are numerous and influential in Japan and China. They fill some of the most important positions in the Japanese Government's gift. Superintendent Aid-rich, of the Imperial Government Railways, and W. H. Stone, Foreign Director of Japanese Imperial Government Telegraphs, are Irish. So also are Captain Brinkley, editor of the Japan Mail, and Messrs. Anglin, and Talbot, respectively proprietor and editor of the leading English journal of Japan. The former was, years ago, on the Hartford Independent, and comes of a patriotic family, his grandfather having participated in the battle of Vinegar Hill. In the other hand, some of the most prominent members of the British Diplomatic Service in Japan are Irish, for example. Hon. F. R. Plunkett, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, son of Lord Fingall; Hon. F. Le Poer Trench, First Secretary; Consular Service—J. C. Hall, Japanese Secretary Legation; J. H. Hobkins, Assistant Secretary Legation; J. J. Quinn, Consul, Hakodadi, Niagata; J. H. Longford, Vice Consul, Tokio; Russell Robertson, Consul, Kanagawa, Sumoor Consul in Japan W. J. Kinny, Assistant, of King's Mad. ow, Waterford; Drs. Wheeler and Fisher, respectively Consulta Doctor and Fleet Surgeon, are Irish. Nor must we admit Captain Carroll, Consul at Kobe, whose well-known Nationalist sentiments have won him the title of "The Fenian Consul." Irishmen are well represented among the leading merchants of Japan and China, and in their merchant marine. Two Irishmen of the same name and blood, Marshal Macmahon, of France, and Gen. MacMahon, of China, were largely instrumental in the organization of the two armies lost lately engaged in deadly conflict. The justly praised pluck system of Japan is said to be founded on the one established in Ireland by Sir Walter Crichton; but it has improved on the original by the addition of a separate prize for political officers. But say those who know, and proudly recount the material successes of their countrymen in that remote land, no one has shed more lustre on the Irish name in Japan, and far beyond its boundaries, than a simple Sister of Charity, Superior of the Community in Yokohama, who left Ireland nearly 20 years ago to undertake the arduous mission of her noble Order in farthest East. Well has Sister Gregory done in the cause of religion and humanity, accomplishing as much by winning the hearts of the power Japanese, and, exciting the admiration of the higher order, as Mr. Plunkett has accomplished by clever diplomacy at the court of the Mikado.—Boston Pilot.

Catholicity in the United States.

At a recent meeting of the Ohio Valley Catholic Historical Society in Pittsburgh, Pa., Rev. A. A. Lambing, President of the association, read an interesting and exhaustive paper on the establishment of the Catholic Hierarchy in the United States. It will shortly be published in pamphlet form and will prove a valuable adjunct to the many historical contributions which have come from Father Lambing's facile pen.

"The assembly in the city of Baltimore a few months ago," the speaker began, "of 70 prelates of the Catholic Church with the other dignitaries of various grades in the Plenary Council naturally attracted great attention, not only with the numerous body of which they were the accredited representatives, but among all classes of citizens, whether they viewed them with a high place. Mobile, the new See endowed to death for the benefit of Leon, is a specimen of the hideous indifferentism which is and was perhaps the largest body of Palatas that ever met for any other than a general council. When we remember that it is not yet 90 years since the first Bishop was consecrated for the Church here, at that time in its infancy, we can realize the importance of a meeting of the highest importance.

"The establishment of the hierarchy of the Catholic Church in the United States, 1790, unlike its foundation in other new countries on previous or subsequent occasions, was not with the work of conversion as of moulding together and consolidating a heterogeneous body composed of elements of the Catholic from several of the nations of Europe, and of converts from the Indian tribes, and of the Africans brought by force to the Western Hemisphere. Thus, too, has come over, some duly commissioned, others without any commission, the present part being members of the recently suppressed Society of Jesuits.

"Father Lambing went on to say that accepting a few scattered settlements, the recent parts of the territory at first embraced within the limits of the Colonies, the Catholics were nearly all located in Maryland and Pennsylvania. The Colonies depending on Kingdoms for their temporal government, it was but natural that in proportion they should also look to the same country. The hierarchy which had been overthrown during the reformation in the mother country had not yet been re-established, but the Church was governed by Vicars Apostolic, and the Vicar of London, on which the Colonies depended, appointed his Vicar-General to rule in his stead on this side of the Atlantic, who resided in Maryland.

"The first of these of whom history further related information was Very Rev. John Carroll, who resided at Port Tobacco, and was exercising jurisdiction at least as early as 1774. He was succeeded before the beginning of the Revolution by Very Rev. John Lewis, who had been Superior of the Jesuits in Pennsylvania and Maryland at the time of their suppression. During the Revolutionary struggle all communication with the Church in the mother country were cut off, either because patriotism would not be exercised or because would interfere with the Colonies.

"With the return of peace, the clergy began to feel the necessity of having a local superior, and the Holy See, at the time had yet arrived for the establishment of a Bishop. A Priest endowed by the Pope with certain extraordinary faculties would, in their opinion, be preferable until such time as the Church would have attained greater strength and numbers. A petition was accordingly addressed to the Holy See, praying for the appointment of a Vicar-General holding immediately from Rome. The number of Catholics in Maryland, 1763, has been placed at 16,000, Pennsylvania, 7,000, and in other States about 1,500.

"Father Lambing went on to speak of the action taken by the Maryland clergy in 1785 in petitioning the authorities at Rome for a local Superior in spiritual matters, and outlined the progress of the Catholic Church from its foundation to the present time. This discourse was listened to with the greatest attention.

A Mixed Marriage Annulled.

From the Roman correspondent of the London Tablet, dated April 11, we learn that the Italie, a semi-official organ, having published in its number of March 8th a statement to the effect that for the dispensation, in the case of the Pepper-Crosse marriage, which has so widely excited the attention and comments of the general press, a sum was paid to the Roman Curia of 200,000 florins, Baron Alexander Tipper de Fulbrugg, one of the parties concerned, in a letter, under date Vienna, March 30th, wrote to the editor as follows: "Sir—Having read the article appearing in your esteemed journal of March 16th, I feel bound to hereby to rectify the inexact statement which is made therein, and to accept my solemn declaration that neither myself nor family have ever paid one sous, either directly or indirectly, either could or do so, for the following reason that, as an Israelite, it was not my place to address to the Pope a demand for dispensation. The Crosses family, as a Catholic family, could alone take that step, and they did, in fact, present to the Holy Father a petition to that effect. For the sake of honor and of truth I claim the integral publication of this, my declaration, without reticence or reservation, namely, that the reports circulated relative to the gift of 200,000 florins, are of pure invention, and I myself, from your loyalty, the correction of your false statement to that effect. This Baron appears, rebelion, in the next issue of the Italie.

The Pope has annulled the above marriage as can be seen from the following taken from the Tablet: Paris, March 31st.—The Pope has annulled the decision of the Congregation of the Holy Office authorizing the marriage of Mlle. de Castrone to Baron Pepper de Podragby, who belongs to the Jewish faith. Last those papers and people which endeavored to make so much capital out of a foreign report, now make due reparation."

Secretary Lamont has given permission to the Little Sisters of Hoy to attend to the interiors and at the entrances of the Ishpeming Department and solicit contributions from the employes. Two members of this order take their meals in the hall, and entertain every week, holding a ballot for money contributions.

A Canard Nailed.

Paris, April 24.—The Abbe Cazalaut, who was sentenced to a month's imprisonment for his sermon in Paris last fall, was executed by the gaoliner this morning.

The above item is the sequel to one that appeared some days since to the effect that a sermon was delivered by the Abbe Cazalaut, in which Gambaut was called a "Trappist Gaoliner." The following from the Liverpool Catholic Times shows how far he is in the pursuit of a religious life, and that instead of his ever being been received into any religious community, he was refused admittance in two.

"The recent terrible murder trials in France are continuing proofs of the fact that the rising generation of that great nation will be one of its idiot scourges, and that the punishment will have been in a great measure brought about by the irreligious teaching fostered and encouraged in high places. Mobile, the new See endowed to death for the benefit of Leon, is a specimen of the hideous indifferentism which is and was perhaps the largest body of Palatas that ever met for any other than a general council. When we remember that it is not yet 90 years since the first Bishop was consecrated for the Church here, at that time in its infancy, we can realize the importance of a meeting of the highest importance.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

Visits to Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Georgetown.—Primeval Relics of Interest to Each.—An Hour in the White House.—Archbishop Gibbons, Bishop Broadel in other Prelates.—Bishop Keiley in New York.—The Catholic Knights Convention, Etc., Etc.

NEW YORK, May 11th, 1885.

Dear Sir.—As intimated in last week's correspondence I have spent the last nine days in visiting Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and have been well repaid for the time devoted to sight-seeing in each. Philadelphia is a social city built in regard to its similarity even to Boston, and as well as the hundred streets of uniformed appearance between—the most of which are wide and well shaded.

That which one may call the Catholic element in Philadelphia is estimated at nearly a million, and a score in high places. Mobile, the new See endowed to death for the benefit of Leon, is a specimen of the hideous indifferentism which is and was perhaps the largest body of Palatas that ever met for any other than a general council. Rev. Peter Beurin, of Santa Rosa, died on Friday last, as an account of his long-continued illness, which he had bore with silent fortitude, and the last rites, and receiving the consolations of religion, and imparting necessary instructions to his flock, he breathed his last. The deceased was a native of Mayence, Germany, and was ordained in the year of the second Plenary Council of Baltimore, and was one of the earliest of the approaching celebrations of the Mass in this residence, and named after the Apostle Peter, in honor of his honored guide, Bishop Peter Kenrick, of Dayton, Bishop of Philadelphia, and Archbishop of St. Louis. The Very Rev. Father Beurin was the pastor of the more of the Sacramento, Napa, Sonoma, Petaluma, and Santa Rosa, and was the pioneer of the Catholic Church in the Sacramento Valley, and was the first to celebrate the Mass in

A RIOT IN LONDON.

Collisions Between a Mob and the Police Force.

LONDON, May 15.—A riot occurred this afternoon between a mob and the police in connection with the Nelson Monument in Trafalgar square. The mob, which had been assembled in the square to make a demonstration against the Government's budget proposal, is composed of the agitator and the unemployed. The crowd was the largest, a large proportion of it consisting of an element in search of pillage. The police found themselves unable to maintain order, and the pressure on the speakers and the rowdies in front compelled them to mount the pedestal of the monument. When, from this enclosure, the speakers were removed, they were rendered impotent by the pressure. The police intervened to secure the safety of the speakers, and then a great struggle ensued between the mob and the police for possession of the monument. The mob succeeded in the end, and the speakers of the moment and the police were finally forced to retire, leaving the crowd singing in triumph. "Rule Britannia." Soon after the mob had completed the speakers' to leave, it surged down to the front of the National Club, which faces Trafalgar square. Every person entering or leaving the club building was mobbed. The attitude of the crowd was so menacing that the club doors were closed and a messenger dispatched to Scotland Yard for aid. Meanwhile, the rioters were still in full possession of Trafalgar square, and Northumberland avenue and adjacent streets were filled by many thousands. The police rally, this time had been largely re-inforced, had had made quite a number of arrests.

RIEL'S REBELLION.

An Important Victory Won by the Canadian Militia.

WINNIPEG, May 13.—A dispatch from Clark's Crossing of May 12th says: Batoche has fallen, and the rebels have fled, being driven from their rifle pits and from the position of the Saskatchewan. The charge was gallantly made by the Grenadiers, Ontario and Quebec battalions, and Midland battalion. The loss is reported in fifty men killed and wounded, including several officers. Many women and children are in their hands. The General is expected to-day or to-morrow in the front of the National Club, which faces Trafalgar square. Every person entering or leaving the club building was mobbed. The attitude of the crowd was so menacing that the club doors were closed and a messenger dispatched to Scotland Yard for aid. Meanwhile, the rioters were still in full possession of Trafalgar square, and Northumberland avenue and adjacent streets were filled by many thousands. Antrim. A new grazing dock of large proportions is about to be constructed for the Belfast Harbor Commissioners. The Half-tide dock will be 850 feet, while its breadth at the coping will be 80 feet, and at the floor 50 feet, and the depth of floor below coping will be 31 feet. The important feature of the design is that the dock is to be divided into three compartments, so that a vessel may be docked, a vessel in repair on the head of the dock, and a vessel may be docked by the hatching and shifting of vessels in the outer compartment, and the dock may be emptied and refilled without the interference of the gates. The entrance will be 50 feet in width, and the depth of water in the entrance. Messrs. McOwan and McFarland, of Derry, have secured the contract.

Armagh.—Mr. Samuel Johnson, manager of the Northern Cut, a branch at Newry, who for the last eighteen years has been in the employment of the firm, and who was closely connected with the agitation for the Charity, recently have been presented with a handsome tea and coffee service, salver, and an illuminated address, on the occasion of his being promoted to his present more responsible position.

Cork. The Most Rev. Dr. McCarthy, Bishop of Cloyne, has made the following changes throughout the diocese—The Rev. John O'Donoghue, late C.C. of Castlelyons, has been appointed to the curacy of Youghal. The Rev. Jas. Murphy, C.C., goes from Youghal to Castlelyons, and the Rev. J. Kelleher, late C.C. of Youghal, goes to Midleton. The Rev. Jeremiah Murphy, C.C., is transferred from Ballydesmond to Buttevant, and the Rev. A. Ulick Burke, late of Doneraile, goes to Ballydesmond. The Rev. Jas. Lynch, C.C., goes from Doneraile to the Rev. M. McCarthy, of Cloina, has been appointed to the curacy of Doneraile, vice Lynch.

The navy pensioners of the Cork District have been called out for active service.

Clare.—Mr. J. J. Dawson, son of Mr. Dawson, Ex. Lord Mayor of Dublin, on April 11, passed his examination of the Royal College of Surgeons in Ireland.

In response to an appeal made by the Honorable Colonel Legge to the people of West Clare to erect a house for the widow Bridget Hanlon, whose husband was shot evicted by Hickman, and who, at the commencement of peasantry assassination, was left with a family of young children, the people in the emigrant district, from the division of labor by the mere distribution of a few little dues to erect a dwelling for the widow. When the building was finished shares were given to the National Leagues and Parnell and Irish independence.

Cavan.—The Most Rev. Dr. Conolly acknowledges the receipt of £7,200 from Dr. Kerr, Bishop of Cincinnati, for the Irish Catholics.

On April 15, the ceremony of reception took place in the Convent of the Sacred Heart, Cavan, when Miss Julia Gaffney, of Ballyconnell, the young lady received the habit of the Order, and Miss Mary J. Mc. Quillan, of Cavan, received the veil. Miss Julia Gaffney, Miss Maria Duke, daughter of Mr. Duke, of Cavan, and Miss Annie Farrell, of Mr. Farrell, of Cavan, received the veil.

Donegal.—The death is announced of the Rev. Charles Boyle, P.P., Gweedore, which occurred on Tuesday last from bronchitis. The deceased was born in Broughderg, in the parish of Termoneen, County Tyrone, where he was ordained priest on the 25th of August, 1857, and was appointed to Gweedore in 1861. He was the brother of the Father Boyle, Haggerty, P.P., Stranlaw, the Rev. Hugh Boyle, the present Bishop of Raphoe, the Rev. Jas. Boyle, of Meath, and Father Hackett, Sligo, who is a nephew of the Bishop of Raphoe. The deceased priest was ordained at Portstewart, 1841. He was a man of great ability, and was a good pastor. He was ordained in Ireland

FOR THE MONITOR

MAY-TIME.

O Christian soul be happy,
Think not of care nor sorrow,
Lift your heart to Mary,
To her so beautiful and fair.

All Heaven are rejoicing,
Their Queen's month has come;
The little Angels are gathering
Roses to lock their Mother's crown.

Mother earth, too, is blooming
With flowers fresh and sweet,
Fair types of the Holy Ghost
That surround Mary's feet.

Why should we not gather roses
And deck her statues grand
That stand so majestic
In every place in the land.

Yes, Mary, your month is bright-hue;
Each and every one of us
In sending fond salutes
To you, our Lady, pure and bright.

We will lay them on your altar
At Benediction time,
May the incenses and their odor
Ascend to your heavenly shrine.

O, Mary, sweet and dearest,
Pray for us to your Son
That we may find rest in Heaven
When our May-time here have gone.

THE DEAD BEGGAR BOY.

BY J. F. FITZGERALD.

Why do I never refuse to give?
Well, listen, my friend, and you'll hear;
Nor dare will forget it as long as you live,
The story I'll tell you, I fear.

The thick, blinding snow fell heavy and fast,
It hung in my mustache my way
To my moist, pleasant home, and made it at last
Seem a mere shapeless mass on that day.

"I'm cold, oh! so cold, and hungry, sir, too,"
Said a faint, pleading voice in my ear;
I turned half around, and exclaimed: "Who are you
You young ragamuffin? how dare you come near?"

Some form, half-hidden in the dim light,
Stood close and cried, in terrible chide tone,
When within all was bright—the storm at its height—
Came a faint, timid rap at the door.

As into the hall I hurriedly stepp,
"Pinner, sir," I heard, that was all;
Back into the snow and the storm he slunk kept,
And then, sir, I heard a dull fall.

I had some misgivings, I confess, when before
Had imposture deceived me that way;
But somehow I got my tough conscience smoothed over
"What, my baby? What, pet did you say?

"I was a poor little boy!" my little May cried
Oh! do let him come in and warm;
Oh! do, papa, do, 'tis cold, I see so cold,
And it can't do us all any harm."

When early I opened my door the next morn,
My God! what a sight met my gaze!
A little dead face in the dim, early dawn
Lay there in the bleak gray haze.

The face that had haunted me thro' the night
Lay there on the door-step, sir,
A slight, rigid form—oh! I from my sight
I could shriek out that vision—or never

And now, sir, you know, you will ask me again
Why I'm always so willing to give I'd rather be now 'mongst the poorest of men
Than bear that sad sight when I live.

The Denver Express.

A STORY OF WILD LIFE IN THE WEST.

CHAPTER I.

Denver is a late distinction, although of an hundred years of age. It is a late distinction therefore, there is a town from which a railroad takes its departure for its long climb up the eastern incline of the Great Plains to the base of the mountains; hence the importance to the town of this large but somewhat shabby building serving as national station. In its smoky interior, late in the evening, and not very long ago, a train was nearly ready to start. It was a train possessing certain consideration. For the benefit of a public easily gulled and amazement of grandiloquent terms, it was advertised as the "Denver Fast Express;" sensational, with strong unfitness, as the "Lightning Express;" and "palatial" cars were declared to be included therein, and its departure was one of the great events of the twenty-four hours in the country round about.

The train-men used no fine phrases. They called it simply, "No. 17;" and, when it started, said it had "pulled out."

On the evening in question there it stood, nearly ready. Just behind the great hissing locomotive, with its parabolic headlights and its coal-laden tender, came the baggage, mail, and express cars; then the passenger coaches, in which the social condition of the occupants seemed to be in inverse ratio to their distance from the engine. First in came emigrants—"honest miners," cowboys and laborers, Irishmen, Germans, Welshmen, Mormonites from Utah, quaint of garb and speech, and Chinamen; and then in the great Pullman "sleepers" the busy black porters were making up the berths for well-to do travellers of divers nationalities and occupations. It was a curious study for a philosophical observer, this motley crowd of human beings; making all differences of race, creed, habits, in the common purpose to move westward—to the mountain fastness, the sagebrush desert, the Golden Gate.

The warning bell had sounded, and the firemen least far out for the night, the giving struck sharply, the conductor shouted "All aboard!" and raised his hand, the tired ticket seller shut his window, and the train moved out of the station, gathered way as it cleared the outskirts of the town, rounded a curve, entered on an absolutely straight line, and with one long wheels from the engine settled down to its work. Through the night hours it speed on, passed lonely ranches and infrequent stations, by well-ordered settlements and old-looking cottonwood trees, over the greenish yellow buffalo-grass, near the rude forts many a poor emigrant, many a bold frontiersman, many a brave soldier, had laid his home but a short time before.

Familiar as they may be, there is something strangely impressive about all-night journeys by rail, and those forming part of an American transcontinental trip are almost weird. From the windows of a night express in Europe or the older portions of the United States one looks on houses and lights and cultivated fields, on fences and hedges, and, hurled as he may be through the darkness, he has a sense of companionship and security. Far different is it when the long train is running over those two rails which, seen before night sets in, seemed to meet on the horizon. Within, all is as if between two great land-ships rose—the nearly dressed people, the uniformed officials, the handsome fittings, the various appliances for comfort. Without, are now long, dreary levels, now deep and wide canyons, now an ever-student of strange and grotesque rock formations—castles, bastionettes, churches, statues. The antelope fleetly runs, and the coyote skulks away from the track, and the gray wolf howls star-off. It is for all the world, to once fancy, as though a bit of civilization, a family or community, its belongings and surroundings complete, were flying through regions barbarous and inhospitable.

From the cab of engine No. 32 the driver of the Denver Express was looking out on a night of wild, lonely, mysterious, awesome beauty. Not a cloud was in the sky, and the moon was nearly full, and the Rocky Mountains, which the train was rapidly approaching, were bathed in a flood of silver light, which, by the contrast it made with the black shadows, lent to them a fairy-like beauty. The train was well up to its time, and the driver was in good humor, and was whistling a tune to himself, when the door of the cab opened, and the fireman, a young fellow, with a face that, in the glare of the furnace, looked very boyish, and with a mass of curly hair, which, in the shadow, looked black, but which, in the light, showed a decided brown, came in, and, in a way, greeted the driver, who, in response, nodded, and then, as his fireman seemed to have something on his mind, and to be waiting for him to speak, he, in the pause, looked out ahead, and, as he did so, he muttered an oath, and, in a moment, called his companion's attention to the fact that a herd of cattle was on the track, and that they must be driven off before the train could go on. The fireman, at the mention of cattle, had sprung to his feet, and, with a few words of apology, had gone out on the narrow footboard, and had disappeared in the night. The driver had shut off the steam, and, as the train had slackened its speed, had, by the use of the air-brake, brought it to a standstill a few rods from the herd, which, in the light of the moon, he could see, was composed of a dozen or more head of cattle, and of two men, who were urging the cattle off the track and down the road. The driver had seen the fireman jump from the footboard, and he had seen the cattle start, and he had seen the men disappear in the night, in the direction in which the train was to go, when, with a sudden jerk, the train had started, and he had lost sight of the fireman. He had seen the men start, and he had seen the cattle start, but he had not seen the fireman start. He was certain of this, and he was certain that the train had not run over the cattle, for he had felt the shock of the collision, and had felt the train slacken its speed after the shock, and had felt it stop a few rods beyond the point where the herd had been. He was certain that the train had not run over the cattle, and he was certain that the fireman had not been run over by the train, and he was certain that the fireman had not been killed by the train, and he was certain that the fireman had not been killed by the train, and he was certain that the fireman had not been killed

MISSION OF THE CATHOLIC PRESS.

Journalism is the greatest social power, because it is the greatest educational power of our time. It is a social class sensitive, reflective, and opinion-generating the world. In our view, religious journalism is not only a useful and serious occupation, but only a work holly commensurate to the welfare of society, let a short or long, be the sphere of its influence. The Catholic Press, Catholic journalism, has to conclude and set defend its truth, whatever it may be—secure all, the Divine truth—Rev. Fr. Tolmacheff, Moscow Catholic.

By God alone and direct through the intermediate of the Pontiffs, the Catholic Journalist receives his mission. He is the sentinel, the watchman, the herald, the trumpet, the voice of religion, his rights and those of his Holy Apostolic, Sun, and others to be directions and principles with devotion and fidelity.—Pius IX

Editorial Notes.

—The man who refuses to take his paper from the post office, when his arrearages of payment for the same are marked opposite his printed name, is an individual that Catholic papers and all other enterprises better avoid as too dishonest to deal with. The only trouble is, we find such fellows out too late.

—There is a report in circulation, emanating from very good authority that Bishop Dalton, of the Alton, Ill. diocese, will take up his episcopal residence soon in Springfield. If this renewal occurs, it will mean a little building of a Cathedral, which would be quite an ornament to the handsome city of Springfield.

—The late Rev. Dean Terry's estate has just been probated at Chicago, Ill., and found to amount to $60,000. Of this, he in his will bequeathed $10,000 to St. Patrick's Church, Chicago, of which he was the resident pastor; $5,000 to the Christian Brothers, $5,000 to the Sisters of Mercy in the same parish, and the balance of the estate goes to other charitable institutions.

Our esteemed contemporary, this Baltimore Mirror, has the following notes of our worthy Chief: "Mr. S. J. McCormick, editor of the San Francisco Monitor, called at our office last week. In the few moments chat we had with him during the time he could spare, we were impressed by the talents and good humor displayed by our worthy confrere. He is a delegate to the Catholic Knights' convention.

—The Rev. Bernard Maguire, S. J., "the golden mouthed preacher," who retired from active missionary work a short time ago, has been induced to come from his retirement at Washington, D. C., to assist the fathers of the Society of Jesus now giving a mission at the Cathedral of the Holy Cross, Boston, Mass. Father Maguire is reputed to be the best Catholic pulpit orator in America.

—A Catholic paper in the East strikes a hard blow at the conduct of Catholic fathers and mothers who will in these times of great social dangers" calmly surrender their daughters of evenings to young men of doubtful antecedents when they please to escort such young ladies away from the pulpit, during missions, and the like; but some think them to right; yet such warnings are the result of an experience learned in the confessional, and parents should profit by and heed them.

In speaking of desecrating the Sabbath the Central Catholic Advocate very truthfully says: "Catholic papers that in their editorial columns decry Sunday desecration and urge their people to a proper observance of God's Day, should be sufficiently unmindful of dollars and cents to exclude from their advertising columns the announcement of Sunday shows, are which in themselves as ignoring of the Sabbath, the means of detraction and desecration, in drawing the people from divine service and their minds from God—if nothing worse. Sunday is not the day for public shows, and Catholic papers should not encourage, even for pay, such abuses.

—As in Prussia, the Catholic Church of Baden is most outrageously suppressed. Thus it is forbidden to employ religious of either sex as teachers, while in Catholic schools the parish priests are bereft of all control over the school teachers appointed and paid by the government, who by word and example teach the children to become apostate, like themselves. Furthermore, in places where Catholics, Protestants and Jews are about equal in number, public schools have been established, where practicable Catholics, Jews and infidels are appointed teachers. In consequence of this lamentable fact, it is just where such public schools flourish, that the godless and hurtful principles of social democracy find fruitful soil.

—"There is no stronger evidence of the demoralization of public sentiment than its palliation of immorality," truly writes the Central Advocate. Persons condemnably guilty of immorality and whose deeds merit the condemnation and ostracism of decent society, are simply pitied as having been "unfortunately indiscreet," not guilty of criminal conduct, but just made a mistake—that is, carried his excesses so far as to be found out and cause him the subject of a scandal and get himself into the newspaper of the law. The violation of God's law, the law of man, the wrong to another, is lost sight of, only the stigma which human respect may cast upon the guilty one—his loss of caste, or prestige, among his set.

—"The cowardly assembly" of New York, as it was well designated by one of its members last week, adjourned without daring to meet the issue on the Freedom of Worship bill. The Catholic Review thinks that there were more than enough members willing to vote for it, if it could be brought to a vote, but parliamentary law requiring a two-thirds vote to advance it from its low place in the calendar, it was smothered. Freedom of Worship crushed to earth will not stay there, which, perhaps, is more than can be said of bigots who fell upon it. Although retarded, the measure is to-day ten years nearer passing than it was last year, and the educating influence the agitation has had on torpid Catholics and misinformed Protestants is almost worth another year's delay. Catholics need to be awakened and honest Protestants enlightened. We believe our demand for justice will do the double service. There may be delay, but there can be but one ending to this struggle.

—The Very Rev. Canon Brosnan, P. P., who is at present in England soliciting subscriptions for the erection of the O'Connell Memorial Church at Cahirciveen, had a most successful reception a few days ago with the English bishops at Cardinal Manning's house, Westminster, where he met them at luncheon on the invitation of his Eminence. All the Prelates expressed themselves very warmly in favor of the project, and assured Canon Brosnan that he had their best wishes in this laudable mission to England. Canon Brosnan is at present awaiting the arrival from India of two whole shiploads of tanks for the manufacture of crosses and other ornaments for the Church, while he is also to get from a spot quite adjacent to the cradle of the human race a quantity of the wood of the olive for bookstands and other decorative church furniture. Both the ivory and the wood are the gifts of an Irishman in India. With the exception of these things and the columns, which are to be brought from America by Father Murphy, who lately came over as a deputation with the remains of the Rev. Dr. Cahill, all the materials of the Church are Irish.

—The Catholic Examiner has the following about the late Convention of the C. K. of A.: "The gathering was in every respect a representative one. There were delegates on the floor from every State and Territory, save alone Arizona. Salt Lake City was represented by a stalwart Irishman, and Montana by an observant German who possessed the ability to crowd a great deal of sound common sense into a very few words. South Carolina was spoken for by a colored delegate, James A. Spencer, who was one of the most intelligent men in the body. Several clergymen were among the list of delegates; one, the Rev. M. Flohr, coming from the remote Northwest—Washington Territory. The press was fairly represented in the Convention by Editor Bell, of the Louisville Catholic Advocate; Rev. Charles Kuhlmann, of the Marshall Church Progress; Jam. A. Puzini, of the Richmond Catholic Visitor, and S. J. McCormick, the veteran editor of the San Francisco Monitor, a good man, who weighs over 250 pounds. In the debates the different accents of the Southern, Western, and Northern delegates was noticeable, the mannerism of each section being more clearly shown by contrast with others.

—Five Catholic religious communities are represented in the Island of Jersey. There are the Jesuits and the Oblats Fathers, missionaries and professors in the higher educational institutions; the Christian Brothers, directing parish schools; the Ladies of St. Andrew, devoted to the education of girls; and the French Sisters of Beaulieu, who give themselves to the service of poor, friendless, strangers; some Catholics, as well as Catholics, patronizing their schools, and applauding and encouraging these charities. Their prosperity could not, however, but awaken the jealous apprehension of a few short sighted bigots, who pretended to see in it a menace to the safety of the State. A bill, ostensibly for the expulsion of the Jesuits alone, but really framed to compass the banishment of all Catholic religious, was lately brought before the State's Assembly. The Rev. Mr. Nevins came out as the advocate of the bill, cited the example of France in expelling the Jesuits in 1880 as a righteous precedent for similar action on the part of Jersey. But he was promptly reminded that France was actuated not so much by hostility to the religious as to religion in any form; and the prevailing spirit of the assemblage, well voiced by the Constable of St. Helier, was that it ill become the descendants of refugees from religious and political persecution, as most of them were, to refuse an asylum to the similarly persecuted; or to oppose religious liberty on any present. The bill was defeated.—Pilot.

The Irish and Catholic Element in the Australian Colonies.

The proposed transfer of Archbishop Moran from Sydney to the vacant See of Dublin drews attention to the large number of our people who make up colonial life. In the Irish and Catholic element in the Australian Colonies varies according to the age of the settlement, being strongest in New South Wales, next Victoria, and east in New Zealand. Catholics form a third of the population of New South Wales, under one fourth of Victoria, and about one-sixth of New Zealand and the other Colonies. There have been several distinguished Governors of these Colonies Irishmen, including Sir Richard Bourke, Sir John Young (Lord Lisgar), and others; while Sir Charles Gavan Duffy, Sir Michael O'Loughlen, Sir John O'Shaughnessy, Dr. Kevin Izod O'Doherty, and many others, have been Prime Ministers, or filled high offices of State. There are at least Catholic Episcopal Sees in the Australian Colonies; two Archbishops, Sydney, the Primacial See, which Dr. Moran holds, and Melbourne, occupied by the Most Rev. Dr. Goold, an Augustinian, with fourteen other Sees scattered over the other Colonies. Most of these Sees are filled by Irishmen. Suffragan to the Archbishop of Sydney are the dioceses of Maitland, Most Rev. Dr. Murray, secretary for many years to the late Cardinal Cullen; Bathurst, Most Rev. Dr. Matthew Quinn, long head of the Education Institution, Harcourt street, Dublin; Goulburn, Most Rev. Dr. Lanigan, another Irishman; and Armidale filled by an Italian. While in the other Colonies most of the Catholic Bishops are also Irishmen, as Dr. Dunne, Brisbane, (Queensland) Dr. Reynolds, South Australia; Dr. Murphy, Hobart Town, Tasmania; Dr. Crane, Sandhurst, Victoria; and Dr. Moran, Bishop of Dunedin, New Zealand; while another Irish Augustinian has recently been appointed Vicar Apostolic in the North of Queensland.

Russia and the Catholic Church.

This war against the Catholic Church in the dominions of the Czar, which was temporarily relaxed last year, is being renewed with fearful force at present. The banishment of the Bishop of Wilna was a proof of the Czar's bad faith in the concordat lately signed, and is other provinces of the Empire as well as in Poland the Government seems bent on destroying Catholicity. The policy adopted is striking like that of the English Penal Code. The Government carefully avoided any avowal of hostility to Catholicity as such. It simply declares certain Catholic practices illegal or Catholic priests ill disposed and then suppresses the same or visits the victim. The great object is to assimilate the Catholic Church to the schismatic religion which acknowledges the Czar as its virtual head on earth. As a matter of course if the Catholic clergy would accept their doctrines and discipline from the Russian Government they would cease to be Catholics, and this is the end to which the persecution is now directed. It is becoming customary for the Prefects of Provinces to order the restoration of suspended priests to the charge of Catholic parishes, to forbid the Bishops or clergy from speaking against the doctrine of the State religion and summarily to suppress Catholic ceremonies at will. Though the persecution has been most severe in Poland it is not confined to that portion of the Russian Empire. Russia proper, east of Poland, contains a considerable Catholic population among its sixty millions of people.

The Archbishop of Mohilleff is the head of the Catholic Church in Russia, and his archdiocese is by far the largest in the world, extending from Poland to the China Sea and including three-fourths of the Empire. His right to act as a Catholic Prelate has been fully recognized by the Russian Government which professes the fullest toleration not only for all forms of Christianity but for Mahometanism and idolatry as well. But in Russia, as in Ireland, the latter of the two is a widely different thing from its administration. The Government may profess the deepest respect for the religious convictions of its subjects in theory, but in practice it requires them to take their belief and its practical results from the bureaus of its core officials. Count Tolstoy, the Minister of the Interior, has been trying to introduce the Russian language into the service of the Catholic Church in the same way as Elizabeth once tried to force English into the Church service in Ireland. The innovation has been so indignantly rejected in the one case as in the other, and the Russian Government has adopted the same system of forcing suspended priests on the Catholic congregations as their lawful pastors.

According to a Russian paper it has become customary wherever a Catholic priest has fallen into any public scandal for the authorities to offer him the alternative of introducing Russian services into his Church or being at once removed. If he consents to the former alternative he is at once protected by the authorities in defiance of all ecclesiastical authority. The same argument serves in Poland for the reformation of Catholicity on the Government model. It is highly creditable to the Russian Catholic clergy that only a very few priests—nine in all have been found ready to barter their consciences for Government support, but it is a striking specimen of despotism that the action of this handful of degraded priests should be made the pretext for requiring the introduction of the Russian language into the Catholic services throughout Russia. As parishes become vacant, at least in certain provinces, the Archbishop is not allowed to appoint pastors to them, unless on condition of introducing the Russian service. The Prelate himself is not allowed to grant the absolution of his diocese or to examine into their spiritual condition, and then in the former diocese of Minsk, which was united to his jurisdiction some years, sixteen Catholic parishes have been left without pastors. It is the old tactics of the English Protestant Government in Ireland, and it is to be hoped that they will prove as ineffectual for destroying the faith of the Russian Catholics as the now half forgotten Penal Laws of Ireland.

Mr. Drexel's Beneficence.

Archbishop Ryan received up to yesterday in response of the Roman Catholic Institutions of Philadelphia, the $40,000 under the will of the late Francis A. Drexel, the banker, who directed that after the payment of certain small specific legacies one-half of the residue should go to a number of Catholic charitable institutions. The remaining half he will work into a trust which he entitles the estate's affairs, and which by blood is position is more than Mr. Drexel's relative will amount to $10,000,000.—Philadelphia Record.

Here is an example that ought to commend itself to every Catholic. No matter what his wealth or his poverty, he ought to give at least ten per cent. of it to God. That is the teaching of all Christianity. It was the practice of its earliest ages. Why should such an example as that of this admirable Philadelphia gentleman be such a rarity as it is. "It is a bad will," says Cardinal Manning, "that does not smelter God among its legatees." Many a Catholic of prominence has died during the past winter, leaving large wealth, and many have died without signifying any gratitude to the hand of that Providence from whom come their fortune. For this lesson to us all, showing that wealth can be religiously used, we all owe something to Mr. Drexel. In his family, we have heard, as in all well-trained Catholic families, there is a devotion to and for the Holy Souls. Perhaps some of our readers who share that devotion, may, profitably for him, now remember the striking proof of Mr. Drexel's charity and justice.—New York Tablet.

Says the Rev. Mr. Bray, pastor of the Protestant church in New Haven, Conn.: "I venture the prediction that if the ebb-tide of Romanism, the Christian Brothers, directing parish schools; the Ladies of St. Andrew, devoted to the education of girls; and the French Sisters of Beaulieu, who give themselves to the service of poor, friendless, strangers; some Catholics, as well as Catholics, patronizing their schools, and applauding and encouraging these charities. Their prosperity could not, however, but awaken the jealous apprehension of a few short sighted bigots, who pretended to see in it a menace to the safety of the State. A bill, ostensibly for the expulsion of the Jesuits alone, but really framed to compass the banishment of all Catholic religious, was lately brought before the State's Assembly. The Rev. Mr. Nevins came out as the advocate of the bill, cited the example of France in expelling the Jesuits in 1880 as a righteous precedent for similar action on the part of Jersey. But he was promptly reminded that France was actuated not so much by hostility to the religious as to religion in any form; and the prevailing spirit of the assemblage, well voiced by the Constable of St. Helier, was that it ill become the descendants of refugees from religious and political persecution, as most of them were, to refuse an asylum to the similarly persecuted; or to oppose religious liberty on any present. The "Bishop's Tract."

A good deal of attention is being drawn of late to the fact that John Marcod is situated religiously near the ground purchased for Catholic cemetery purposes a good many years ago. Some of the papers have been commenting on the matter as if the lands of the Church were bound in the interest of humanity to sell at once about the proposed cemetery rather than interfere with such a matter as a part of the water supply to the city. Remember, that the "Bishop's Tract" was bought as premises for cemetery purposes in 1860, and they practically a monopoly for the sale of water in San Francisco, and they found that the water of Lake Merced would be a cheap article to furnish, and hence they bought out as much of the land around it as gave them control of the desired water.

At the time when the purchase was made some eight years ago the thousands, the "Bishop's Tract" been several years paid for by Archbishop Alemany, and its intended object was publicly known. It is not to be thought that a water company's rights are different from the rights of other citizens, and if they need a piece of property for their business, it is just as proper that they should pay for it. If the land around Lake Merced should be deemed too costly to purchase, the company may find water from any cheaper source they please, but they have no more right to demand the location of the Catholic cemetery tract than they would have to object to the creeping of dairies or stables near the Lake. The water supply is to be raised, of our memory serves us rightly, at the time of the purchase of the Lake by the Water Company. It was stipulated that the Hibernia Bank mortgage under which the Water Company acquired its title, did not take in the whole shores of the Lake, and that the owners of the land adjacent shall carry on industries there which would be objectionable to the Company. The only solution was to buy out the owners if the Company wished for their property, and the same apply may be made for those who fail of forbidding the Catholic cemetery the lawful use of property which she had acquired years before Lake Merced was anything thought of as a source of water supply for San Francisco.

Have You Complied With Your Easter Duty?

We have already called the attention of our readers to the approaching season of their Easter duty. We are well aware that many have not delayed this important obligation so long, yet, for all that, many excuse themselves for slight causes and defer this momentous occasion to the last moment, allowed by the rubrics of the Church, to fulfill this duty in time, without exposing themselves to the danger of not being able to comply therewith before the time expires.

Any Catholic who raises his salvation will not expose himself to the dreadful consequences of incurring the wrath of the Church, without making an effort, and employing the means that Christ has left in His Church to secure his temporal salvation.

In those days of rampant infidelity and worldliness, when so many minds are wholly employed in worshipping the dollar and benefitting their bodies, it is healthful to be able to know that the vast majority of Catholics, will stop in their headlong career of worldly aggrandisement and think of the life to come and the means of rendering it happy. Not every one who says "Lord, Lord, shall enter the Kingdom of Heaven." It is only those who do the will of the Father, "as the body without the spirit is dead, so also faith without good works is dead."

A few days more is all that remains for us to obey the precept of the Church, and we hope there is not a single reader of this paper but by Trinity Sunday can lay his hand upon his heart and say, I have done my duty to God, myself, and fellow man.—Catholic Progress.

—The last number of the Liverpool Catholic Times that has reached us contains a statement which clearly shows what kind of stuff the supporters of Alex Sullivan are made of. M. de Dorvilla Mailleffer, the French deputy, is the church warden and ministrant of M. Pouyer-Quertier, a Deist of Paris. Recently he brought his children, very ostentatiously, to make their First Communion in the hands of the schismatic monk, and M. de Mailleffer has, himself, on several occasions followed the same ceremony. But now comes the report that this same supporter of the Loyola schismatic "is about to be President of an "anti-clerical" (atheistic) Congress to be held at Rome, to celebrate the centenary of Voltaire and the anniversary of Garibaldi. Then the step between Loyola-ism or French "Old Catholicism" and atheism is a very short one, and the line dividing them is purely an imaginary one.

Correction of the Catholic Religion at Omaha. Important Improvements Introduced into the Order. Reductions in Accounts. Harmonious Gathering of Delegates. The Banquet. Much Eclat.

New York, May 18th, 1885.

Dear Sir—The 47th Convention of the Supreme Council of the Catholic Knights of America, concluded its labors last Friday evening after a session of four days, during which time a vast amount of business transacted, with the writers of this Grand Catholic organization was transacted. The proceedings opened with a Solemn Mass at St. Francis Xavier's Church, the Rev. Father Jeremiah O'Connor was celebrant, Rev. E. C. Kuhlmann, deacon, and Rev. Chas. C. Kuhlmann, subdeacon. After Mass the Knights marched to the hall, where the meeting was called to order by Jesse M. Mills, secretary, President of the New York State Council. In his address Mr. Mulkeany welcomed the delegates, and hoped their labors would be productive of a pleasant one. He read a letter from the Mayor's secretary, regretting the inability of Mayor Grace to be present, as an important engagement, in connection with the new aqueduct, prevented him from attending the Convention. Mayor Low, of Brooklyn, also sent a letter, regretting his absence, as the convention a pleasant time, and expressing his regards that he could not be present.

A roll of the officers of the Supreme Council was answered by the following: William E. Russell, Supreme Secretary, Boston, Mass.; E. A. Davis, M. D., Supreme Vice President, Brooklyn, N. Farm and Home.

WITH A SMILE ON YOUR FACE.

Come to the door with a greeting,
Clean with a smile on your face,
Where life is found you are meeting
Worthy a beauty embrace.
Treat not smiles as a trifle
Those whom to love you delighest;
But will disbelieve, baffle,
Show a glad face at the door.

Many a joy will go by you,
Many a pleasure pass by,
Simply because you have neglected
To open the door of your face.
If you would thus be unfriendly
To their sad looking sisters,
Coming yourself to the door.

When loves life wanderings dreary,
Homeward this way return
For the dear face so cheery
By his own fireside he spurns
And if they yet at his coming,
Gloat that the parting is over,
They will be ready to greet him
For he is right of the door.

Only to think of the greeting
Kindly at closing his day—
Only to think of the meeting—
Oh, to it shelters the way!
Trials and worries perplexing
Trouble the spirit no more,
When we are met with caresses
From a dear one at the door.

Home is the symbol of heaven;
Here is the foretaste of joys
All the years smile as given
May be delightfully spent,
If we are honest and faithful,
If we are true to the core,
Letting love stand like an angel
Always in shape of the door.

Children at Table.

Never let your children come to the table until you are quite sure that they won't undertake to do all the talking. This you should make a law when you have company. Tell the company there isn't room for them. You are never safe with the children at the table. If there is anything you don't want known it will be told then. The boy who never noticed that the spoons were plated will shout, as though giving you information:

"Oh, see the gold coming through the spoons!"

And that same boy will say he wishes it was Sunday, and when your guests ask him why, he will reply:

"Because we always have pie Sunday. You will find out he knows a great deal that you never suspected he knew, and you will be at a loss to ascertain how he ever acquired himself with the facts. A boy at the table is a will-spring of displeasure. If his sister is kissed by any one he is always the person to witness the performance, and tells of it at the table before a crowd. He is always the one to give to the world the fact that his sister uses powder, wears false teeth, and is thirty-two years old. If there is a mortage on the place the boy hears you speak of it, then goes around talking about it as though it were something to be pointed to with pride and pleasure. Everything you say in the bosom of your family that should not be repeated, the boy repeats; and he always has the faculty of repeating it at the wrong time and to the wrong person.

If you say the clergyman's sermon are too long or too dry, the boy will take it all in, and say nothing until the clergyman comes around to make his regular visit, and then he will let it out just after you have entered the room. If you say the doctor is not fit to cure hens, he will jump up on the doctor's knee, when he calls, and cunningly say:

"Oh, doctor, mamma says you ain't fit to cure hens."

The odd things that boys will do boys will be boys, and no other combination will cover the case. The boy is always in mischief. When he is at school he is slinging up some kind of dentistry to perpetrate when school is out. Or else he is playing tricks on the teacher. When he is at home he is twisting the cat's tail, or disturbing her heartsharing dreams with a bearskin. If there is no cat to torment, he will torment his little sister by making faces at her or dressing the dog up in her doll's clothes.

The World's Wool Clip.

The New York Commercial Bulletin gives the following as the figures of the world's wool clip for the last three decades:

	1880.	1870.	1860.
Europe	715	867	930
United States	112	114	200
Australia	79	197	200
River Plata	56	160	250
Cape of Good Hope	28	46	52
Total	1,061	1,372	1,767

Commenting on the above, it states:

Thus, the wool clip of the above countries has risen 50 per cent in twenty years, or four times faster than the population, and yet prices have fallen only 25 per cent. It is quite possible that in the next fifteen or twenty years wool may fall another 25 per cent, but sheep farming will still be one of the most incrative pursuits in the world.

While it is not improbable that in countries like Australia, for instance, a further reduction of 20 per cent might leave a margin of 7 per cent, profit, yet the present low prices have so seriously crippled the wool growers of the United States, both East and West, as to have caused numbers to reduce their flocks, so much so, in fact, as to cause a marked increase in the number of pulled wool and pelts thrown on the market. The serious depletion of flocks on account of low prices could hardly be advised. On the contrary, the weeding out of inferior sheep, whatever the breed, is the practical plan. Sheep should have a place on every farm however small. They are three golden instead of twos golden. They furnish wool, they provide valuable food, and their manure is valuable in the vegetable kingdom, and also as being distributed in such a manner as to become immediately available when dropped. Sheep also consume weeds and, even by other stock, and their wool is ready for market at a time when the farmer is not usually money-making; just before harvest. It is three, therefore, who weed out inferior sheep and breed up the remainder, who will have cause to congratulate themselves, because the market may turn, upon their practical sagacity.

Farm Notes.

—The Santa Ana Herald believes that raisin grapes are the most profitable that can be cultivated, and says: "It is not an unusual thing to gather sufficient grapes from an acre of vines in this valley to make 200 boxes of raisins. This year, yields from a raisin grape vineyard, in good bearing order, seldom falls below $250 per acre.

—The Farmer's Gazette (Ireland), claims that the operation of disbarring cattle made the animals much more valuable, and that it made the disbarred animals more tractable, docile and less dangerous to men and each other.

—The reputation of the Midwest Portrait Co. of Chatham, Michigan, has become world wide. Business, for the work to furnish, enlarge and make perfect portraits is unequalled. I advise those enlarge perfect portraits equal to the Pacific Coast, either from tintypes or photographs. The enlargement is delightfully well can be fully relied on.

GOOD MORNING TO YOUR NIGHTCAP.

"Good morning to your nightcap,
Good morning to you,
Fresh and fair and fasting
Since Hall came, no sweet collars,
As night falls beneath the moon,
Come then lay aside of Cheatham,
Have not you wed that's now.

"Good morning kindly, gentle sir,
Many a dangerous pitfall
But if you want to hear the news,
I fear you ask in vain.
The sad the good all times are gone,
And over all the land
Is a dreary, dreary moaning
Twill keep you from the sun.

Twas early in the morning,
The dew was on the grass,
And now the evening star is up,
He's gone to bound of sun,
The shower was gone and over,
And twilight alone the sun.
Yet still beneath the parcel
We watched the sun arise,
Then stepped into the village church,
And heard some news that's new.

Then was there news in Cheatham
Of falling and of woe,
And all the parish joined the fun,
And toasted the good old priest.
Now, be the morning wet or dry,
There's news to be had
When walking sigh in Cheatham,
But quite a parcel.

A Cow in a Box.

The following story was some time agoreiated by a French professor with reference to the difficulty he experienced in learning to pronounce the English language, whose orthography is so complately at variance with its elementary sound.

The first time the Professor ever visited London he caught a violent cold on the voyage.

Having landed he lost no time in sending for a physician, and while waiting for his arrival consulted his dictionary as to the terms he should employ in stating his case. He found that the French word "toux" was expressed by "cough" in English.

"Cough," applied the Frenchman, "How long had I have this? I cough a cough and cough is 'cow.'"

At last the doctor entered and began to feel his patient's pulse, without finding much indication that anything was wrong.

"I have no trouble dare," said the Professor, putting his hand to his throat, "but here, see! I got a cow!"

"Walk, sir, I am not a cow doctor," said the surgeon, indignantly. "Why do you send for me to see your cow?"

"But you will understand me," said the disconcerted Frenchman. "Here is my cow—here!" and he thumped his breast in desperation.

The doctor shook his head and thought the man must be demented.

The Professor again had recourse to his dictionary, thinking that if he could state the precise locality of his cow the doctor would understand the case. Presently he looked up in triumph. The word "cloak" he had unconsciously lighted upon. It was just what he wanted, so he joyfully exclaimed: "Now, sir, you will understand—I have got a cow in my box!"

The doctor fairly rose a peal of laughter, the Professor's meaning at last dawning slowly upon him, and the poor Frenchman almost died of chagrin. When the Professor afterwards told the story his audience were perfectly amused with merriment, and fully appreciated the gentleman's endeavors in favor of the English spelling reform, as concluded by saying—

"If by the introduction of any changes in this direction, you can do anything for my "cow" it will be a great boon to me."

His Half Sun.

"Is that young man your son?" asked the Judge of an old gogro who had been arraigned before the court.

"He's my half son, sah."

"Half son! How do you make that?"

"His mudder was married fore I married her!"

"Then he's your step son!"

"No, sah, he sint, for he wan't borned for two years after she married me."

"Then he's your son!"

The old fellow scratched his head for a moment and said:

"Dun de fact dat his mudder was married 'cosin fore she ever see me, make dis boy my half son!"

"Of course not."

"Den he's my whole son in he!"

"Yes!"

"Come back ter me, Nelas, an' let yer daddy fling his arms round yer. Been er boung half 'cat boy all o' his life. Come back to yer daddy, sah."

Wisconsin Lawyers.

A middle-aged, enterprising-looking passenger, said he was a lawyer in a Wisconsin town, and the handsome dashing young man who was flirting with a pretty girl on the front end of the car was his son.

"Is your son a lawyer, too?"

"No, he never comes near the office. Doesn't know any law. He is a great help to me, though."

"Assists you in court then, or in hunting up witnesses or taking depositions, does he?"

"No, he doesn't. The fact is, he won't work at anything. He is a gentleman of leisure, he is, and does nothing but wear fine clothes and have a good time. Don't know how I could get along without that boy."

"Ah!"

"Guess you don't understand me. That boy is always flirting with women, and prevents married men. He's a rakish lad, you know, and has been the cause of seven divorce suits in the last year. Six of them are my hands on one side or the other. If the boy does so well this year I'm prepared to take him into partnership."

A Country Editor Goes to Church.

The editor of the Hardwood Blazer attended church for the first time last Sunday. In about an hour he rushed into the office and shouted to the telegraph editor:

"What in the blazes are you fellows doing! How about the news from the seat of war?

"What news?

"Why, all this about the Egyptian army being drubbed in the Red Sea. Why, the gospel sharp up at the church was telling about it just now and said a word or two about the sermon yesterday. Hustle round, you fellows, and get the facts, or the Busy Bee will get a beat on us. Look very, thoughtful and run an extra edition of a newspaper, and get out a special entitled 'Great English Victory on the Sunday.'"

Easily Identified.

Coroner—I have just held an inquest over the body of a man found drowned, but we are unable to identify him.

Citizen—I know a man named Short. He has been missing for a week.

Coroner—You know Short, did you?

Citizen—Know him like a book.

Coroner—Would you be able to identify him, do you think?

Citizen—Up yer, easily. He had an inquest on his pocketbook.

ARCHBISHOP ALEMANY'S FAREWELL.

[CONCLUDED FROM FIRST PAGE.]

and in the most supplicating voice said "Won't you pray for my girl, Archbishop?"

"Yes, God bless you," replied the Archbishop, kneeling in the midst of the whole multitude.

The carriage door was at last closed, and the Archbishop, with Archbishop Riordan, Vicar General Prendergast and P. J. Oliver were driven to the ferry, where they took the 2.30 boat and crossed to the Oakland mole. A sad band here clustered to take the clergy and a few laymen to Port Costa, to say a last farewell. About eighty persons took the 3 o'clock boat and crossed the bay, where Archbishop Alemany was found in the last seat in the shortest car. The scene at St. Mary's was repeated on the Oakland mole. The clergy and laity that intended to go to Port Costa found seats in the car, but a large number of people stood at the window to catch a last glimpse of the Archbishop. Men and women came into the car to shake his hands and wish him a happy journey. One woman pressed forward and asked him to make the cross on her forehead, which he did with a blessing. The train soon drew out of the depot and the Archbishop sat down by the side of one of the aged priests.

BLESSING A MULTITUDE.

At the Oakland Station there was a scene, that perhaps was never before witnessed in the country. As the train stopped a crowd of 300 or more gathered about the last car, which was the one occupied by the Archbishop and the party escorting him. At first he rose and bowed at the window, but people clamored for him to come to the platform. As he stepped on the platform a hundred hands were stretched out to clasp his and men and women pressed forward to kiss his hand. The stop at the station was only for a moment and soon the people saw the train moving slowly away. Simultaneously they fell on their knees, more than 300 of them, some on the track, others on the rail, and yet others on the walk. The men reverently removed their hats. The tide was rippling in and dashing against the rocks on the beach. The sun was glistening on the water, and like a shining path of light across the bay. The train drew away from the kneeling people, and the Archbishop, removing his hat, blessed them with his outstretched hand. As he stood in this reverent attitude, the wind blew his gray locks and a tear came to his eye. The train gathered speed, and soon was whirling along the shore and out of sight of the heavy-hearted people, who were rising, with the sunlight and the archbishop's blessing on their hearts.

As the train approached Port Costa the Archbishop rose to take final leave of the men who have been laboring with him for years. With one accord the clergy and laity built in the aisle and received the Archbishop's final blessing. As the old man passed through the aisle to a Pullman at the head of the train he was received with respect by everyone. As the train ran on board of the ferry boat, the Archbishop stood on the platform and waved a farewell to his friends, who bade him God speed with full hearts.

Among the civilians who accompanied His Grace to Port Costa were Congressman Ryan, Peter Donahue, D. J. Oliver, Robert Tobin, Sr., Richard Tobin, Jr., Col. Robert Tobin, Philip A. Roach, D. T. Murphy, Dr. J. H. Gibbons, R. K. Reilly, J. A. Donahue, P. J. Thomas, A. P. Hotaling, Jr., Dr. Hassett, T. J. Welch and many others. Among the church dignitaries who went up the road were Archbishop Riordan, Fathers Prendergast, Gottie, Montgomery, Connolly, and Harty of St. Mary's, McNally of Oakland, Brennan of Mission Dolores, Harrington of St. Francis, Gallagher of St. Joseph's Church, O'Neil and Vincent of the Dominican Order, Mc-Nabos of Alameda, Varni of St. Ignatius Church, Serda of Temescal, Sebastia, Wolf, Franchi, Ancomani, Scanlan, Very Rev. J. Cooke, Canney, Gleason of Brooklyn, Hartigan and many others.

AT SACRAMENTO.

Archbishop Alemany was met at the depot, Sacramento, Sunday night by Fathers Tyrea, Walsh, and a few prominent members of St. Rose's Church. On the arrival of the train the delegation boarded the special car in which the Archbishop was travelling. Judge Armstrong delivered a most appropriate address which was feeling responded to His Grace. Afterwards the Archbishop came out on the platform and gave his blessing to many who had crowded around to see him for the last time.

THE WEEK'S NEWS
—FROM—IRELAND.

IRISH NEWS BY MAIL.

Antrim.—The national element in the Northern division of Antrim, determined on establishing the "Salmon of prayer" between the two English parties, have established, in Dollymary, a National Inebriation Association.

The organization of the National League, as applied to the township of Umeen, is to be fully by the establishment of branches of the Land League in Ballyvourney, and of the Plan of Campaign in Ballyvourney from the hands of their landlord and creditor agent.

Cork.—On April 25, the sub-Sheriff of the County of Cork, accompanied by two bailiffs, proceeded to the estate of Thomas Kenny, Ballinphan, in the parish of Ballyvourney, to repossess, for non payment of rent, the unfortunate old man was removed from his home and his little effects were put upon the road.

Clare.—Among the saloon passengers from New York on the Cunard steamship Bothnia, arrived, sailed off the harbor, on April 25th, was the Most Rev. Dr. Fennelly, Catholic Bishop of Kerrville, Bishop O'Connor is a native of Queenstown, where he still has a cousin residing. His brother, who at one time was a curate in the diocese of Cloyne, was for very many years Bishop of Pittsburg, but subsequently resigned the pontacy and joined the Jesuit Order in Baltimore, where he died a few years ago.

The Most Rev. Dr. McCarthy, Bishop of Cloyne, has made the following pastoral:—"Dear Clergy, Dr. Murphy, C.C., Kanturk, in his pastoral charge of Kilbrack, says he intends to dedicate Fr. M. Kennedy, P.P., to the Sacred Heart, M. McCarthy, from the Pulpit of Ballymacoda.

Brown.—In the debate recently in Parliament on the Redistribution Bill, Mr. Healy endeavored to have the chairman of the Newry Town Commissioners appointed the returning officer instead of the Sheriff of Down, but his proposal would not be accepted, though his amendment was carried.

Mayo.—A large and enthusiastic meeting of Belmullet was held at Drumrue, near Stranagford, for the purpose of establishing a branch of the National League in that locality. The Rev. Mr. McKenny presided. Mr. Daniel Deacy, M.P., addressed the meeting.

Donegal.—John Sheridan Maclean, Jun., has been appointed a resident magistrate for the county Donegal.

A fishy meeting was held at Ballyshannon. The local League Branch was reconstituted and a new committee appointed. Mr. Hugh Caffery is president; Mr. T. McIntyre, treasurer, and Messrs. Gallagher and Kelly, secretaries. The tone of the meeting was encouraging. The Treasurer being empowered to send to the Central League a suitable subscription for affiliation.

Dublin.—Margaret Nolan, of 37 Lagan street, in the city of Dublin, died on April 25. The damage done was about £50, for buildings innately been got under before the fire in progress. About two years ago the factory was entirely destroyed by fire, causing great ruin and depriving a large number of people of employment for a considerable time. The new premises, which were erected about a year ago, are much more extensive than the original buildings.

On April 26, at Mr. Daniel O'Connor, of 27 James's street, Dublin, was killed through Marlborough street, his house shed and fling like hastily to the ground. He was conveyed in an insensible condition to Jervis Street Hospital. The jury in a matinee established a verdict of accidental death. The evidence of the coroner, who stated that the deceased had been a member of the South Dublin Poor Law Board.

Gilnavery.—Sister Mary Faustina, only daughter of John O'Donnell, C.E., of Galway, died at the convent that place, of which she was a religious for thirty years, on the 22nd of April, aged 57 years.

Tipperary.—Mr. Bernard Kennedy, of Ballyvourney, has been appointed to the office of Sub-Sheriff, and all the assent offices which belonged to the late sub-Sheriff, Mr. Kennedy, to the respect of the community in which she lived, and her death, which was unexpected by all the consolations of religion, found a universal regret.

Kerry.—The death occurred on April 26th, at a branch Unwanted on Ben Session, aged 70 years, Mr. Thomas Murphy, the only son of Mr. Stephen Murphy, of Ballyvourney, and father of the convent that place, of which she was a religious for thirty years, on the 22nd of April, aged 57 years.

Leitrim.—The national schools were recently closed at Kilcrogher, on Mr. Tottenham's property. The gentleman having left the country, he has given the management of the schools to Parson Scott. The children who are attending these schools are mostly Catholics, with a few exceptions therefore, their parents would not send them to be instructed under Protestant clergyman. The schools are now closed and that other schools in the neighborhood have refused to receive the children.

Hopkins, one-time Land Leaguer, and Dr. Kelly, is very annoyed for Protestant clergy, and the management of Catholic schools, lest it might lose to proselytism.

Tullow Fair, on Friday last been held on the corner of Kilkenny, is the more important corner of Tullow.

Limerick.—The County High Sheriff of Limerick, Lieutenant-Colonel Gorges, Ryan Manor, that suddenly at his residence, Riverstown, Castleconnell, on April 27, deeply regretted by a large circle of friends. He became ill, and died in a few hours, after receiving last rites of the Church.

The valuable wintergrass of Tuam was recently sold by Mr. John Joyce, auctioneer, for £160, and the important farm of Ballybake and Ballycolane was sold to Mr. John Spillane for £7,000 by Mr. F. W. McCarthy.

Louth.—A notable instance of the love and esteem exhibiting between priests and people was attained on April 26th in Dundalk, on the presentation to the Rev. Father Browne, O.S.A., on the eve of his departure for Australia, by his friends and substantial testimonials, in the shape of a purse of gold. The presentation took place in St. Augustine and Monica and the Ladies of Charity, Monica's sodality to the Rev. Father Browne.

Sligo.—Another act of petty tyranny has been exercised lately in the vicinity of Mr. Ashley's bog-ranger, to the tenants in the lower part of the county Sligo, to desist drawing the bog turf, that for years back they carted home for farm purposes. This order was issued some time about Christmas last, so that the small farmers could not avail themselves of the Winter to get from the bog the turf which so much contributes to the comfort of the clergy and leaders even in this locality. The result is, that the poor are left in a miserable state with a bitter cold, until they have again recourse to the bog, and, in this instance, for the use of their cows, they measure for their potatoes.

Tyrone.—A remarkable case of poisoning occurred, on April 29th, at a place called Kilgroney, near Omagh, by which a prosperous farmer named Kane, living in comfortable circumstances, was for some time past observed to be in a weak state of health, and was consequently put under close watch. (If late he became more emaciated, and, on Sunday, in the absence of his wife, who was on a visit, and of the servants, was found in a state of death, the cause of which was pack which served the window.

Tipperary.—At a meeting of the Tipperary Board of Guardians, on April 29, the question was discussed as to whether or not there was in a dying condition in the house could will question for the support be received. A number of the members of the board were of the opinion that they were entitled to be paid, but the document was not produced. The county Tipperary, having for some time back declared their inability to pay the rate, a reduction were granted. Mr. Gibson, of the Property Indemnity Association, has a large number of cattle boycotted by the more prominent farmers of Ballyvourney. It is said that nearly all the boughs have paid their rent.

Wexford.—The Queen's County Bill, the Wexford Chronicle says, is not a measure of justice to Ireland, but it is a measure of justice to Wexford. Some of Lord Normanton's tenantry at Emly have, it is stated, been served with notices, declared their intention of paying no rent unless the Property Indemnity Association, which, it is said, has taken up their cause, is willing to pay the rent of the estate. The result has been that nearly all have been induced to pay the rent.

Wexford Town is to be deprived of its fine sample glacier in the approaching Wexford Horse, lock plack on April 30th. The station of Mr. Meeks has been purchased by the Rev. Father Very Rev Patrick Crane, O.S.A., a native of Wexford, who for so many years adorned the spiritual wants of the people of New Ross, and subsequently of Dublin, and who was the intimate friend of the late Archbishop of the late Mr. and Mrs. Cullen, Dr. Cullen, Dr. Cullen, Dr. Cullen, Dr. Cullen, Dr. Cullen, Both the stations are nearly likeable.

POISON AT THE FRONT DOOR.

No article entering so generally into the food of every family has been found more villainously adulterated than baking powder. For the purpose of understanding the "Royal," whose absolute purity and wholesomeness has never yet been questioned, hundreds of dealers are putting up baking powders with alum, or aluminated cream of tartar, which contains lime, earth, etc., adding strength by the free use of alum.

These adulterated powders are "shoved" upon the public with the greatest persistency. They are first given away—left in samples at private residences, with circulars containing lagon analyses and certificates, and false representations as to their value, etc. This fact of itself is sufficient to condemn them. A first-class article will sell on its merits. No manufacturer whose goods are of value can afford to give them away, and none but the cheapest make and most inferior or unmarketable goods require to be distributed free in order to get the public to use them, and this method is adopted only by parties who have failed to dispose of their wares through the ordinary and legitimate channels of trade.

Free samples of articles of food left at the house should be regarded with suspicion. There is no guarantee of their wholesomeness, while there is real danger that they contain a fatally poisonous compound. Many instances of poisoning from the use of such samples are recorded.

The Royal Baking Powder is never given away, sold by means of lotteries, nor accompanied by chromos, spoons, crockery or other gifts, except the gifts of absolute purity, wholesomeness, full weight and superlative leavening power. These gifts are guaranteed with each package. Its own merits have been its chief advertisement, and they have secured for it the constant patronage of the American public to an extent beyond the combined sale of all other baking powders. The Royal Baking Powder is absolutely pure and perfect.

OUR SCHOOLS.

St. Mary's College.

During the past week the students of the commercial department of St. Mary's College passed a very satisfactory state regular yearly examination. On Friday the 23, the members of the banking department exhibited a very creditable familiarity with the various studies in their course. The following young gentlemen received honorable mention:—Messrs. Geo. Cuffey, John Kennedy, H. Jas. J. Lane, W. Ryan, R. Phelan, J. Lynch, J. Joyce, J. Ellis, G. Clark, J. Scanlan, F. Lynch, Jeffrey, R. McNab, the Fathers Cummins, the closing exercises will be held in the College Hall on Friday, May 7.

On Wednesday the 29th, the following pupils were entered: Misses Collins, Collins Orphan, Christina Gutierrez, extract, "Death of Poverty." Misses Lydon, Lydon, Lynch, Lynch, Lawrence W. Smith, history, extract, "Washington's Farewell." Misses Lydon, Lydon, Lynch, Lynch, Lawrence W. Smith, history, extract, "Washington's Farewell." Misses Lydon, Lydon, Lynch, Lynch, Lawrence W. Smith, history, extract, "Washington's Farewell." Misses Lydon, Lydon, Lynch, Lynch, Lawrence W. Smith, history, extract, "Washington's Farewell." Misses Lydon, Lydon, Lynch, Lynch, Lawrence W. WHAT'S THE MATTER?

YOUNG CALIFORNIAN'S WHO ARE FACING THE WRONG WAY.

There was some conjection in town the other day about celebrity certain men and town and had no visible means of support, and who had received no money, and who had no business, and who yet seemed to have a livelihood. We had not seen them before, and we wanted to know them, but some of them were painted out to us as men who were "on the Stock Exchange." Young men, too, they were, who had been educated at the expense of the State, and who had received a liberal education in the public schools of the State, in some degree degrading, if must be fashion and habit, but they were young men

Poetry

"IF ONLY."

Amid a busy multitude I sate,
A busy multitude around me throngs,
And yet I was alone and desolate!
The victim of one vain, restless longing,
My heart within me felt so sad and lonely,
And ever seemed to say—"Alas! if only!

A passing friend in kindly pity said,
"Why, what ails you?"
Alas!
He might as well have spoken to the dead;
As to the victim of that one refrain
My heart within me felt so sad and lonely,
And ever seemed to say—"Alas! if only!"

A brother stopped me footily by the hand;
"The world around," he said, "is clothed with gladness—
Take comfort." Ah! he would not understand
How sad critics lies the secret of my sadness
My heart within me felt so dark and lonely,
And ever seemed to say—"Alas! if only!"

A sister watched me with a thoughtful eye,
And happiness seemed almost to awaken
Beneath that look of gentle sympathy,
I almost felt that I was not forsaken.
And yet my heart within felt sad and lonely,
And ever still it said—"Alas! if only!"

A mother's glance, oh! such a holy grace,
Looked down through tears upon my desolation
Ah! in—that was there wanting to enhance
The magic of that mother's consolation.
Yet even then my heart felt sad and lonely,
And ever seemed to say—"Alas! if only!"

And still amid that crowd I sate and sighed
Alone, through loving friends around were throngling
For as I thought on them, my own feet bebid,
Still ever seemed to say, restless longing,
My heart still seemed lonely:—Alas! if only!
"Not most hence, I were not lonely!"

WHAT IS HEAVEN?

"What is Heaven?" I asked a little child;
"All joy!" she said, with sunbeams in her eye.
I asked the aged, with her care oppressed:
"All suffering's o'er, oh! Heaven at last, is rest!"
I asked a maiden, meek and tender-eyed,
"It must be love!" she softly replied.
I asked the artist, who adored his art;
"Heaven is all beauty!" spoke his rapture heart.
I asked the poet, with his soul afire;
"The glory—glory!" and he struck his lyre.
I asked the Christian, waiting her release;
A calm round her, low the answer, "Peace!"
So all may look with hopeful eyes above,
"To beauty, glory, joy, rest, peace and love!"

The Denver Express.

A STORY OF WILD LIFE IN THE WEST.

CHAPTER III.

Sinclair found his wife very thoughtful when he came home, and he listened with much interest to her story.

"Poor girl," said he, "Foster is the man to help her. I wonder where he is. I must inquire about him."

The next day they proceeded on their way to San Francisco, and matters drifted on at Sinclair's much as before. Johnson had, after an absence of some months, come back, and lived without molestation amid the shifting population. Now and then, too, the mysterious President Denver reappeared and made absolved somebrave the fears of some of his former "saves" from the "Rawhiskin's House," as his gaudy saloon was called.

It was the very evening on which this story opens that Foster appeared in the train-house on the Sierras. "Jim" Wallace, agent and telegrapher at Barker's, was sitting in his little office, communicating with the station-room by the ticket window. "Jim" was a cool, silent, efficient man, and not much given to talking about such episodes in his past life as the "sipping out" by Indians of the construction party to which he belonged, and his own rescue by the scouts. He was smoking an old and favorite pipe, and talking with one of the "boys" whose head appeared at the window. On a seat in the station sat a woman, in a black dress and veil apparently waiting for a train. The woman suddenly raised her head and said:

"Mr. Watkins," cried she, "can I see you for a few moments where you can not interrupt us? It is a matter of life and death." She colorbed in the silk veil, over her hands, and her voice trembled. Watkins recognized Sally Johnson in a moment. He unbolted a door, mediomed to be always closed and again bolted it, and also closed the ticket-window. Then he placed a chair, and the girl sat down and leaned eagerly forward.

"If they knew I was here," she said, in a hoarse whisper, "my life would be safe five minutes. I was waiting to tell you a terrible story, and then I heard who was in the train and came here to meet you. Mr. Watkins, don't, for God's sake, ask me how I found out, but I hope to die if I don't tell my job the living truth. They're going to wreck that train—Number Seventeen—at Dead Man's Crossing, fifteen miles east, and rob the passengers and old express car. It's the worst gang in the country—Perry's. They're going to throw the train off the track, the engineer will be mashed and killed, and Mr. Sinclair and his wife are on this car. Oh, Mr. Watkins, send them warning!"

She stood upright, her face deadly pale her hands clasped. Watkins walked deliberately to the railroad map which hung on the wall and scanned it. Then he resumed his seat, laid his pipe down, fixed his eyes on the girl's face, and began to question her. At the same time his right hand, on which he had held the pipe, found its way to the telegraph-key. None but an expert could have distinguished any change in the clicking of the instrument, which had been almost incessant; but Wallace had "called" the head office on the Missouri. In two minutes the "sounder" rattled out, "All right. What is it?"

Watkins went on with his questions, his eyes still fixed on the poor girl's face, and all the time his fingers, as it were, playing with the key. If he were imperturbable, so was not a man sitting at a receiving office nearly five hundred miles away. He had "taken" but a few words when he jumped from his chair and cried:

"Hunt that door, and call the superintendent, and be quick! Charley, brace up—lively—quick! Tell the superintendent that his wonderful electric pen, the handle several hundreds of miles long, Watkins, unknown to his interlocutor, was printing in the Missouri dialect the whole message. "Information received. Perry gang going to throw Number Seventeen off track—near sixth mile post, this side Dead Man's, about nine to-morrow (Thursday) night. Kill passengers and rob express and mail. Am alone here. No chance to verify story, but believe it to be on a square. Better make arrangements from your end to block game. No sheriff here now. Answer."

The superintendent, responding to the hasty summons, heard the message before the clerk had time to write it out. His lips were closely compressed as he put his own hand on the key, and said these laconic sentences: "O. K. Keep perfectly dark. Will manage the rest."

Watkins, at Barker's, rose from his seat, opened the door a little way, and saw that the station was empty, and then said to the girl, brusquely but kindly:

"Help you've done the square thing, and saved that train. I'll take care that you don't suffer, and that you get well paid. Now, come home with me, and my wife will look out for you."

"Oh! no," cried the girl, shrinking back, "I must run away. You're mighty kind, but I daren't go with you." Detecting a shade of doubt in his eyes, she added, "Don't be afraid. I'll die before they'll know I've given them away to you," and she disappeared in the darkness.

At the other end of the wire the superintendent had quietly imposed secrecy on his operator and clerk, ordered his fast mare saddled, and sent off a messenger to Sinclair.

"Read that," said he to his secretary. "It was about time for some trouble of this kind, and now I'm going to let Uncle Sam" (the United States) "take care of his mail train. If I don't get to the reservation before the peaceful's turned in, I shall have to wake up. Wire, and dispatch, please. The gray mare made the six miles to the military reservation in just half an hour. The general was smoking his last cigar, and was alert in an instant; and before the superintendent had finished the jorum of "hot Scotch" hospitably tendered, the orders had gone by wire to the commanding officer at Fort Conway, some distance east of Barker's, and had been duly acknowledged.

Returning to the station he remarked to the waiting secretary:

"The general's all right. Of course we can't tell that this is not a sell, but if Sheriff Perry hounds mean business, they'll get all the fight they want; and if they've got any sense, when I doubt, may the Lord have mercy on them!"

He prepared several dispatches, two of which were as follows:

"Barker, Sheriff, Denver, Colorado.

"His telegram your authority to take charge of train in which you are concerned. Do as he directs. Keep everything secret and act in accordance with orders of Mr. Sinclair."

"Fort Conway, Colorado.

"Detached Perry gang will try wreck and rob No. 17 express train, sixth milepost. Uncover. Division, about nine Thursday night. Trespass Sinclair, Barker, and Fort Conway. Keep everything secret and act in accordance with orders of Mr. Sinclair."

"It's worth ten thousand dollars," unsolicitously remarked he, "that Sinclair's train. He's got both sand and brains. Good-night," and he went to bed and slept the sleep of the just.

CHAPTER IV.

The sun never shone more brightly, and the air was never more clear and bracing than when Sinclair helped his wife off the train at Pawnee Junction. The station-master's face fell as he saw the lady, but he said the engineer with as sharp an air as he could assume, and watched for an opportunity to see him alone. Sinclair read the dispatches with an unmoved countenance, and after a few minutes' reflection simply said, "All right. Be on the sly in the matter perfectly quiet. At breakfast he was distracted—so much so that his wife asked him what was the matter. Taking her aside he at once showed her the telegrams.

"You see my duty," he said; "I may only thought is about you, my dear. Shall I go on?"

She simply replied, looking into his face without a tremor:

"My place is with you." Then the conductor called "All aboard," and the train once more started.

Sinclair asked Foster to join him in the smoking compartment, and tell him the promised story. When the latter did this recess at Barker's, he frankly and gratefully said, had been the turning-point in his life. He had "lived down" his past from gambling and drinking, had found honest employment, and was doing well.

"I've my things to do now, major," he added, "and I'm a thousand miles from home. I went to find that poor girl that I left behind at Barker's. She was engaged to marry me, and wanted me to think of it, and what a life I'd have made her head, I hadn't the heart, till now, to look for her; but, seeing I'm on the right track, I'm going to give her a chance, and get her to come with me. Her father is a—old scoundrel, but that isn't her fault, and I ain't going to marry him."

Foster, politely asked Sinclair, "do you know the Perry gang?"

The man's brow darkened.

"Know them?" said he; "I knew them much too well. Perry is an uncolly cuss—threw me over killed an emigrant in cold blood, and he's got in his gang nearly all those hounds that tried to hang me. Why do you ask, major?"

Sinclair handed him the despatches. "You are the only man on the train to whom I have shown them," said he.

Late going to put the responsibility on your shoulders. I have no doubt that if we are attacked the soldiers would dispose of the gang, but I must take all precautions for the safety of the passengers. We must act alarm them. They can be made to think that the troops are going on a scout, and only a certain number of reliable men need be told of what we expect. Can you, this afternoon, go through the cars and pick them out? I will then put you in charge of the passenger car, and you may post your men on the platforms to act in case of need. My place will be ahead, in an occasional smile to Foster. In the afternoon on the Missouri the reporters were gathered about the conductor, engineer, lighting his cigars and filling their note-books with items. Still, nothing was would gladly have done the same, but Watkins failed to notify them. It is also said that the train had been gone and a friend re-marked:

"Hope they'll get through all right," to which the reply was:

"Yes, likely."

Then he went to the telegraph mate, and said, "and have orders at Barker's to hold a story as wild as a Norse saga, but what is and when I have responsible was ready."

(Number Seventeen, fifty-five minutes late.

[THE END.]

What They Think of You.

There are many Catholics who avoid controversy on religious subjects with those of other denominations, because they think that "religious controversy does no good." But, having regard for their interlocutors, a Catholic could only know what he ought to do when he knows that his Catholic acquaintances to believe in, vanity and would upset his neighbor's faith in his faith. No man likes to be thought a fool, yet it is an exaggeration to assert that even the most illiterate and uninstructed of our Catholics understand Catholic belief to be a absurd and incorrect way that we are not exactly detecting from our Catholic neighbors. Yet, if we look at it carefully, we will find that in the seven questions of the Catechism, we have at least the seven capital sins which are the root of all other sins; and that is plain enough that while we are asking that God's name may by hallowed, we are asking that his family may be united in one family. "Now to the King of ages, immortal, invisible, the only God, be honor and glory" (1 Tim. i. 17) and that thereby we are endeavoring to make our hearts all submissive to God's will, and that we are asking that our own wills may be made to conform to his, and that, if we are asking for our own eternal salvation, we are asking for a share in what "Eye has not seen, nor ear has heard, nor has it ascended into the heart of man, what God has prepared for those who love him." But as we cannot procure this eternal happiness by being obedient to the divine will, therefore it is that we say, "Thy will be done on earth as it is in Heaven." We are asking for our own fulfillment of the divine will of temporal goods which are signified under the name of bread which is our principal nourishment, and more especially we are asking for those that are contained in the Sacramental bread, in the Holy Eucharist; we will further say, "Give us this day our daily bread," in order that all impediments in the way of our spiritual life, such as sins, temptations and the penalties of this life which are the result of our sins, and then add the last three petitions—"Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us, etc., etc. Amen."

It should be remembered that what we are petitioning in the "Our Father" will be granted to us only on condition that we are actually delivering from our hearts all those who "trespass" against us. Let this be carefully, we will find that in the seven petitions of the "Our Father" we are asking for all

"Journalism is the greatest social power, because it is the chief agent in formulating public opinion; and proper to lead blind multitudes whether good or evil. Hence, the Catholic Journalist has to meet difficulties and obstacles in his mission, which are not encountered by his brethren of secular journals, but which are inevitable in the warfare of entirely, but a sort of spiritual kind. What is and what ought to be the whole of a Catholic journalism but to unmask error and defend the truth? Journalism is the Catholic Press, and the Catholic Press—Pope Pius IX. Address to Catholic Journalists.

"If the Holy Ghost, acting through the intermediation of St. Thomas in Latin, could so write prescriptive law which is to be printed, the writers of Catholic journals also defend the Catholic Journalists, and the Catholic Press, in a Latin, possible too, and adhere to the doctrines and principle with devotion and fidelity.—Pius IX.

Editorial Notes.

—For three hundred years Protestants have proclaimed the Bible as the only Rule of Faith, and they are not done trucking with it yet!

—The Catholics of Liverpool can give their brethren in America a point in paying for a needed Seminary. Bishop O'Reilly of that diocese, in a recent pastoral, informs the Lancashire Catholics have paid $292,000 for their new Seminary at Wigan.

—There are more Irish in the cities and towns of England than in many cities in Ireland. For instance, there is an Irish population of 200,000 in Liverpool, and with Birkenhead and other outlying towns an Irish population of a quarter of a million. There are 50,000 Irish-speaking people in Liverpool.

—Last week on the motion of Mr. Gladstone, seconded by Sir Stafford Northcote, the British House of Commons granted an annuity of $30,000 to Princess Beatrice on the occasion of her prospective marriage. Mr. Labouchere, in opposing the motion, said that the Queen should provide the annuity. The Irish people have to pay their portion of the plunder.

—The Michigan Catholic says the movement for organization among Catholics is growing steadily more general, and we are proud to note that Catholic journalists are everywhere at the head of it! The editors of one esteemed contemporaries, the Most Rev. Archbishop of the Church Province of Marshall, Ill., were both delegates from their respective localities to the general convention of Catholic Knights at New York recently.

—At the recent conference of the section of the Red Cross, the Emperor of Germany offered a prize of $1,000 and a gold medal for the best model of a barrack and field hospital. American inventors were requested to compete. The barrack must have twelve beds, be easy to transport, and capable of being taken down and reconstructed. The designs should reach Antwerp by September 1.

—"As a matter of courtesy," says the Colorado Catholic, "Catholic institutions and organizations might send their items to Catholic papers." In reprinting the above the Catholic Catholic has the following: "Father Carr, editor of our esteemed Rocky mountain contemporary, will find out when he has more experience in the journalistic field that Catholic institutions and organizations, as well as Catholic individuals, will assist him very little. Our people are generally very quick to find fault, but rather slow in sifting the Editor in collecting valuable information."

—The custom of having the Church bells ring, morning, noon, and night, and reciting at their sound the prayers called the Angelus is of comparatively modern origin. The evening Angelus was introduced by Pope John XXII., in 1327. The Council of Lavaur, 1368, ordered that the bell should be rung also at sunrise. The Angelus at noon is attributed by some to Pope Calixtus III., 456, and by others to Leo III., 1472. Mabillon thinks that the Angelus, as now practiced, is of French origin, and became general at the beginning of the 16th century.

—The Catholic Tribune, Kansas City, Mo., has this to say concerning the Monitor: "We have been kindly favored with a new exchange, the Monitor, published in the Golden City of San Francisco. It is one of the best Catholic papers in the Union, replete with interesting Catholic and Irish news from all parts of both hemispheres presented in readable form, as well as able editorials upon Church and State affairs that reflect credit upon the gentlemen who successfully conduct this excellent journal. May it live long and prosper in its noble work for the cause of Catholicism and Ireland that it so gallantly espouses."

—A letter from Constantinople mentions that an English Protestant lady there invited an apostate Greek to preach in her house. All her servants were ordered to attend, but one—a Catholic—refused the being asked his reasons, he replied: "I hear so many sermons from my own priests that I should consider that I was filling my time away if I heard any more. Your Greek servants can well attend, as in the Schismatical churches they never preach. But my great reason for refusing is my objection to listen to apostates." The lady never invited the Greek apostate to preach in her house again; and shortly after the incident just described she was received into the Catholic Church, the faithful servant acting as her godfather.

—A most successful mission, given by the Jesuit Fathers, has been in progress for the last two weeks in the Cathedral of the Holy Cross, Boston. Father Maguire was the principal preacher, assisted by Fathers Langenke, McGarthy, McDonald and Conlanch. The first week was devoted to the women and the second to the men. Fourteen priests were at one time in the confessional, during the first week, and 5,000 confessions of the women were heard. The large Cathedral was packed every evening and we used hardly say that the sermons and instructions were extremely interesting and edifying. Father Maguire, who lies had forwarded to Boston during what he called his last Mission at St. Mary's, some months ago, was induced to leave his retreat and buckle on his armor once more for the benefit of the Boston people, and right royally has he fought his battle.

—"Some people are born mean, some achieve meanness, and others have meanness thrust upon them, but those who will take their paper from the post office for a year, realizing it unjustly until asked to pay for it, and then insultingly send back all the dirty copies they have had on dirty wrapping paper, belong to the first class. We would like to give the name of one that we have before us now." It is thus the Catholic Columbian tells of a class of people—large at that—and its remarks will be endorsed by a large majority of the press.

—The Catholic students of Germany have sent an address to the Holy Father, in which, amongst other things, they declare their full submission to the precepts of the Divine Law which the Holiness has promulgated in the celebrated Encyclical, Humanum Genus, and which they promise to follow as a sacred rule for their present and future life. The corrupting schools condemned in that Encyclical, "which work in darkness, strive to tarnish the splendour of the Catholic Church, to break its unity, to falsify its doctrines and, even, if it were possible, to annihilate it entirely," they repudiate with horror; and they assure the Sovereign Pontiff that they will never have any connection with them whatever.

—The estate of the orator, Wendell Phillips, has been appraised, and instead of the $200,000 which it was supposed he had left the total value of his property is only $8,362 03, of which $4,338 25 is in real estate, and $4,023 80 in personal property. It was known that Mr. Phillips, during his later life, received large sums of money by bequest and in other ways. A few months before he died the city of Boston paid him $25,000 for his Essex street property, taken for street improvements. The only explanation of it is found in the astonishing use to which he put his money. The appraisers report finding among his papers about 45,000 shares of worthless mining stocks, of a par value of a million dollars or more, which doubtless cost Dr. Phillips a fortune.

—We have often heard it said and read it, likewise in type, says the Catholic Columbian, that young men are prevented from marrying by the fear of extravagance on the part of a wife. We believe this to be a very foul scrawl, for now-a-days the young men are really the extravagant ones and the young women the contrary. There is a love of freedom and a desire to be unrestrained, a selfish feeling, among the young men. In dress, dissipation and amusements they will spend twice the amount, probably, necessary to keep a family, and will denounce extravagance in their sisters, on the last pretext. The young man will have his pockets well filled with change with which to purchase occasional cigars, drinks, or play a game of billiards, or visit a theatre, and will think nothing of how that the dimes may go during the day, whilst his sister or mother will count out the nickels for street car fare with the precision and care of a banker in arranging his thousands.

—"Atlas," in the London World, says: "The Catholic world has been a good deal exercised by the appearance of a little pamphlet, entitled 'Wa Catholique—a plea for equal divorce among English followers of the Pope. Those are told that they may claim as co-religionists almost everybody who is doing anything—from Lord Ripon to Tracy Turnerelli; from the author of 'The Angel in the House' and the painter of 'The Roll Call' to Miss Mary Anderson and the inventor of the bassoon; from Sir John Lubbock, the drafter of the Redistribution bill, and Mr. Charles Russell, Q. C., to the founder of the 'Financial Reform Alliance;' from the Assistant-Adjutant General Sir Arthur Herbert, to the editor of Punch; and from incomparable Cardinals like Manning and Newman to incomparable cricketers like Mr. O'Brien. A hundred or so of such names are adroitly introduced to point the moral of the little brochure, which is said to be the work of a well known Catholic peer."

—The last number of the Catholic Review contains the following: "As a man lives, so shall he die. It was to be expected that the Cardinal-Archbishop of Paris, entering his ministry of penance, should approach the death-bed of one of his flock, who, baptized and educated a Catholic, rejected in his hour of pride the faith and obedience of his baptism. But it was hardly to be expected that the law of life and death should be reversed even in regard of Victor Hugo. So the cable tells us that his son-in-law stood in the pathway of the Cardinal and ordered him to tell that angel of mercy for his dying relative that 'Victor Hugo needed no priest.' Whether Victor Hugo would have said so to the Cardinal, it is useless to inquire; but the moral clearly is that whenever anticipates sending for a priest in his mortal agony, ought to make the preliminary steps a habit during life. 'As a man lives, so shall he die.' It is a pleasant or an unpleasant prophecy, according to our sense of its personal application."

—The St. James Gazette of London calls attention to the fact that Catholicism has of late years made progress among the Princes of Germany. Duke Philip of Wurtemberg, the only Prince of the Wurtemberg royal family who possesses male property, is a Catholic, as are all his children. Duke Paul Frederick of Mecklenburg has brought up all his children as Catholics. All the members of the princely house of Schoun Braunfels are Catholics, some of the Princes of Schoun having "married into the Church." Count Charles of Schleinburg Forderglauchen will ultimately pass to the Catholic branch, it being the only one which has male heirs. Prince Hatzfeldt of Wahlstadt, grandson of "Marshal Forwards," is a fervent Catholic, as are all his family. The entire house of Isenburg-Birstein have gone over to Rome; while there has been numerous conversions in the family of the Counts of Stolberg. The same may be said of the families of Hohenlohe, Scheer-Theuz, Schoerberg, and a considerable number of others.

A Dominican Archbishop.

On the eve of Archbishop Alemany's departure for Rome, it was meet that the Catholics of California should offer him some testimonial of their gratitude for the work of thirty-three years among them. It is impossible to compute such services to him, and if they were computed, no earthly reward could pay for them. By the command of the Holy See, he humbly left his monastery and became Bishop of the See of Monterey. He was an humble Dominican friar, unable to speak a word of English—he was an Archbishop, he still kept the heart of an humble Dominican friar and the vow of poverty of his Order. He ascended the steps of his episcopal throne with all the dignity that became a Prelate, but the poor knew his humility, and those nearest to him also knew that, out of all the revenues of his rich diocese, he took nothing for himself but the barest necessaries. He was the almoner of God.

The old Order of St. Dominic, which he loved so well and which loves him so well, now opens its arms for his son weary of the cares of the shepherd and the weight of a mitre so heavy in all times. His cause in San Francisco a poor Dominican friar; he left the episcopacy as he entered it. In a recent number of the San Francisco Monitor an appeal is made to the Catholics of California to provide a life pension for the declining years of a Prelate who has wielded his crook or over the lambs and the sheep during a lifetime.

On June 29, 1850, Joseph Sadoc Alemany put aside the white robes of his Order and assumed the purple of a Bishop. He was promoted to the See of San Francisco July 29, 1853. Until the present Archbishop, the Most Rev. Patrick W. Riordan, was appointed his Coadjutor one sure reservation in 1883, Archbishop Alemany had borne for thirty-three years, through storm and sunshine, the great burden of his office. Now, with grateful heart, he gives it up to younger hands, turning himself towards Rome, penniless, to ask for admission to a convent of his Order. It was a moving and pathetic spectacle, strange and unusual in an age of materialism. But, though he shrank from the gratitude of his flock, and asked only their prayers, they were not so unmindful as to what was due to him. On May 20, a number of leading citizens waited on Archbishop Alemany and presented him with a purse of $10,000 prior to his departure from San Francisco. The clergy of his diocese also presented him with a purse of $6,500. On Sunday, May 24, he went to Rome, probably never to return. He went, followed by the prayers and blessings of many of his spiritual children, whom he had seen grow from infancy to manhood, always with increasing love and reverence for him.—N. Y. Freeman's Journal.

When will it be Stopped?

When in the name of public decency will we see the last of this custom of laying the cornerstones of public buildings with Masonic ceremonies! Why should it exist at all! What is there about a court house or other public building that it should be stamped with the Masonic seal! Is this—Masonic ceremonies—the best we can do? Are all our public buildings of every class contributed Masonic structures! The abominable practice of having this Masonic mummery thrust into every such public enterprise is an insult to the public. People of all classes and conditions are now contributing to the fund for building purposes for the Bartholdi statue. If there is to be any Masonic grab over it the national monument will simply insult the contributors who do not believe in any such stuff.

The Masons have a perfect right to dedicate their own buildings in any way they choose, and so has any other society that can afford to build a structure of its own—but why any one of these organizations should be privileged to dedicate a public building, or intrude their particular corrupt ceremonies upon the public is something more than we can imagine. Supposing some other society should claim the privilege of laying cornerstones and promenading around every new public building or monument that was erected, what would the Masons have to say for themselves! Furthermore, what would the public have to say! Supposing that some religious body should demand that they be allowed to dedicate every new structure in this country, what kind of treatment would they demand get at the hands of the authorities. What particular claims have the Masons to this privilege! We never heard that the first man to set foot on this continent was a Mason. We see nothing Masonic in the Declaration of Independence, nor is there anything of the kind in the Constitution that we can discover. There were no Masonic ceremonies in progress when the boys were enlisting for the struggle in the late Civil War, and there certainly was nothing Masonic about the fighting. The Masons didn't drive the English soldiers out of this country at the time of the Revolution, nor did they put down the "Rebellion," as far as we have learned. They are very much of if they owned the country and were the founders of its institutions, but we fail to find the fact in history. The cool manner in which they take every new public building under their charge gives one the impression that they have a mortgage upon them all, but we never saw or heard of any such mortgages being recorded. The abuse has been carried about far enough, and it should come to an end at once. The people will not tolerate it much longer in a country like this.—Inland Sun.

—Michael Davitt is at present in Egypt. He is on his way to Jerusalem and his goal thence to Australia for a lecturing tour, after which he returns home via the United States, where he will also lecture. Mr. Davitt, writing from Cairo to the Pall Mall Gazette, with reference to the suppression of the Bosphore Egyptien, says: "French influence is now supreme in Egypt. Egypt is not to see, in the suppression of a paper which courageously defended the French interests, the same unscrupulous grabbing policy which England has pursued in the country since the acquirement of the Suez Canal shares, and the end to which is to be the final annexation of a land which French genius and enterprise have done so much to develop."

The Necessity for Parish Schools.

A standing excuse for not establishing a parochial school in parishes where there are none and where no earnest desire is felt or effort made to establish one is: The parish cannot sustain one.

The excuse in many instances is utterly delusive. The truth is that no parish that is self-sustaining, or aspects to become self-sustaining, can afford to do without a parochial school.

We do not now refer to the fact that every consideration—even upon the ground of the Pastoral Letter of the recent Council at Baltimore—incompete; incomplete in failing to make adequate provision for the own spiritual needs, and guard its children from the dangers of a non-Catholic education.

Our purpose is a different one. It is to show that, even looking to the numerical and financial growth of a parish, the failure to establish parochial schools is a gross practical blunder.

To a parish that expects to retain within the communion of the Church its own natural increase—the children of Catholic parents born within its limits—parochial schools are a necessity. The statement needs no proof. Facts in the past and facts occurring day by day in the present, support it. Where children are left to obtain their school education elsewhere than in Catholic schools, vast numbers of them become careless in the practices of their religion, "liberal" in their ideas, and drift away from their Church. In confirmation of this statement we need only refer to declarations of the assembled Archbishops, and warn advocates of "non-sectarian" education. One of their avowed chief reasons for supporting irreligious public schools is that they drain off Catholic numbers of Catholic children from the true Church and faith.

The influence and the assistance, moral and material, of these children, when they grow up, are not only lost to the parish within which they were born and brought up, but go to the support of interests that antagonize it. If they move elsewhere, still their influence and support are lost to the Church and go to swell the strength of opposing influences.

The children are the hope of the Church, and of every parish in the Church. Wherever they are lost, the Church suffers irreparable loss—loss of numbers, loss of material resources, as well as incalculable spiritual losses.

It is perfectly well known to those who have paid any attention to the history of the Church in particular localities in Pennsylvania that there are parishes seemingly possessed of every local advantage necessary to their growth, yet which have positively gone back as regards numerical and financial strength. When the causes of this are searched for neglect of Christian education, neglect to establish parochial schools, or to maintain them, if they were once established, will be found to be the chief causes, and very often the primary and chief cause.

Another fact, too, is clearly developed by even a cursory examination into the history of the Church in Pennsylvania, and that is that the neglect of Christian education

ROCKING THE BABY.

I hear her rocking the baby—
Her room is just next to mine—
And I fancy I feel the dimpled arms
That round her neck entwine,
As she rocks, and rocks the baby,
In the room just next to mine.
I hear her rocking the baby
Each day when the twilight comes,
And I know there's a world of blessing and love
In the "baby bye" she hums;
I see the restless fingers,
And the weary little head,
And the sweet little smiling prattling mouth,
That to her is blessing enough,
Rocking the baby.

I hear her rocking the baby,
Slower and slower now,
And I know she is leaving her last good-night
On its lips, and cheek, and brow.
From her rocking, rocking, rocking,
Could she have—though she was willing—
Rocked the baby through the wild between us,
She is resting on a heart,
While my empty arms are aching
For a form they may not press,
And my empty heart is breaking
In its desolate loneliness,
I feel in the rocking, rocking,
In the room just next to mine,
And breathe a prayer in silence,
As a mother's broken chrisc,
For the woman who rocks the baby
In the room just next to mine.

Long Naps.

Every now and then we hear of some wonderful sleeper, who alarms his family and excites the neighbors, and is interviewed by reporters, by reason of his tremendous "capacity for sleep." People who say of those naps that nothing like them is on record of before, but the records of the Royal Society prove that one Samuel Chillon, a farmer of Hinsbury, near Bath, England, set all these people a very fine example in the 1694. At that date he was a fine, well developed man, 26 years old. He came in from the field one day, and before eating his dinner lay down for a nap. When the meal was ready his mother vainly endeavored to rouse him. Brothers and neighbors united through the day in trying to bring him to a sense that his work in the field had been neglected, and that his pot of beer stood untasted. He slept on and on for twenty-one days, when he arose and went to his work as usual, seeming quite well. At the end of May he yawned violently, and went to sleep again. This time a neighboring apothecary was called in, who did his worst on him, according to the barbarous medical practice of that time; but did not awake from his second nap until the 7th of August. He then arose, talked and walked about as usual, and believed that his friends were playing a practical joke on him, and was only convinced of the time that had elapsed since he went to sleep by finding that all his neighbors were getting in their harvests. After this Chillon remained awake the day and slept at night like other folks for a year, when he fell asleep and did not awake until the end of January, having had a continuous nap of more than five months' duration. During this time the doctors from near and far experimented on him by bleeding, cupping, blistering, and other heroic modes of torture, but all in vain. He slept right on. This was his last abnormal nap. From that time till his death, he slept and was waked like other people. He said that "somehow he'd got good and rested," and had no dread of a return of the attack of sleepiness. Such a capacity for sleeping seems scarcely desirable, except for cross babies, who might perhaps at times sleep a month or so with great advantage to their families and the neighbors, if they only waked up feeling as much better for their rest as did Samuel Chillon it the year 1694.

The Best Wool.

The property for which wool is perhaps most valued is tenacity in breeding. In a true bred sheep each staple of wool—each lock into which a group of fibres naturally forms—will be of equal growth throughout. The fibre will be the same thickness, as nearly as possible, the whole length, or will be finer at point than at root. There will be no sharp rough wool in it, but if the sheep be cross bred, or illkept and exposed to storms, the fibres will be rough at the points and coarser than at the roots, the reason of this being that as the wool gets longer as it is more exposed to bad weather and bad treatment, nature makes it stronger to resist what it has to encounter, while the part that is next the skin remains fine to give greater warmth. Such wool, even when combed and spun into yarn, never lies smooth and evenly as true-bred wool, and is consequently not as much value. There is another sort of wool which farmers do not seem to under stand, and writers on the subject often ignore, but which is found more or less on all cross-bred sheep and on sheep which are too much exposed and fed on hilly districts. This is known as "kemp" or dead hairs. These hairs vary in length and consequently according to the breed of the sheep. The white Highland they are about two inches long, and very thick; in cross-bred Australians they are very short. In the former they occur the under side of the fleece, in the latter they are so few as not to be of any importance. They are, however, all alike in this, that they are a brilliant shining white (except on the sheep with gray wool, when they are black), and they will not dye the same color as the rest of the wool. They, consequently depreciate the value of the wool very greatly, making it only suitable for low goods.

Sulphur for Grasshoppers.

The following communication in relation to a remedy for the grasshopper plague is from General John McDowell, Warden of the State Prison at Folsom, and will be of interest to all farmers who are afflicted with the pest:

The sulphur-smoke remedy for driving off the grasshoppers (published in a city paper a few days ago as a communication from a farmer who had lived in Nebraska during the grasshopper invasion) gives good results. I tried it this evening, on my return to the prison, and found that the grasshoppers at once disappeared from the places scented by the sulphur smoke. The plan is to put out piles of straw on the windward side of a field, put on each pile about the third of a pound of sulphur, and at sunset set fire to the piles, the smoke keeps close to the ground in the evening, and the grasshoppers find the fumes disagreeable, and at once disappear. It is a cheap remedy and may be applied to vineyards and orchards with great advantage, even if not threatened with grasshoppers, as the sulphur protects the vines and trees from oidium, or mildew.

Notes.

—The best farmers never allow land to be idle, for with ground, as with people, idleness is productive of mischief. Weeds will grow if no crop is planted. As soon as rye or wheat has been harvested, sow peas or some fast growing crop. Plants applied in connection with this will greatly enrich comparatively poor soil.

—A member of a Chicago firm of fruit-dealers is in this State making contracts for California raisins. He says that this firm imports 300,000 boxes of raisins annually, but he prefers California raisins when grown on warm, gravelly soil, not over irrigated, to the best raisins from Malaga. This is most encouraging to raisin makers.

Family Fun.

ONLY A PIN.

Only a pin;
And it calmly lay,
In the shining light
Of the bright noon day.

Only a boy;
He saw that pin,
And fond as it took letest,
Till boy and pin alike were best.

Only a chair,
It had no business standing there.
The boy he sat on a finnish grip,
And on the seat of that chair he fired that pin.

Only a man.
He sat on the chair,
And as he rose—
So did his hair.

Only a pail!
But as honest one,
It lacked all the elements of fun,
And man, and boy, and pin, and chair,
Is well confusion mingled there.

The Hot-Water Cure.

Patient—And so you think that the water cure for my dyspepsia?

Doctor—I am sure it will relieve you if you take it in the right way.

Patient—When is the best time?

Doctor—Just before meals. Take about a quart after you sit down to the table.

Patient—August? Why, then I would have no room for anything else.

Doctor—Certainly and consequently no indigestion.

Very Considerate.

"Why didn't I go to her assistance?" said the man who stayed in bed while his wife laid on a burglar. "Young man, I've had a number of issues with the old gal, and I knew the burglar had enough trouble without my giving him any."

One Hole Better than Two.

A journeyman waiter took to his employer a piece of cloth he had just finished. Upon examination, two holes about half an inch apart were found in it, on account of which a deduction of two shillings was demanded.

"Do you charge the same for small as for large holes?"

"Yes," replied the master, "a shilling for every hole, big or little."

Whereupon the waiter immediately tore the two holes into one, exclaiming—

"That'll save a shilling, anyhow."

His employer is said to have been so well pleased with his wit that he remitted the whole fine at once.

Down on his Landlady.

Mrs. Slimdiet—"I am going to buy some new motions to decorate our home. Of course I have a 'Blow-Our-Home' motto for the front hall, and I also have some appropriate ones for the parlor. It is the prettiest room that bothers me."

Boarder—"I saw one to-day that would just the thing."

Mrs. Slimdiet—"Indeed, where was it?"

Boarder—In a shop."

Mrs. Slimdiet—"That is a queer place. What did it say?"

Boarder—"I said, 'If you don't see what you want, ask for it.'"

Putting in Her Whole Soul.

Mrs. Blinker asked Matilda, the house servant, a few nights ago:

"What dreadful scratching is that out in the kitchen? It must be the dog trying to get in. I heard something like it in my life."

"Dat's no dog scratching the door. Dat's de cook writin' a lah letter to her honey sucklin who works ober in Covington."

He Was Not Sulled.

"You have furnished rooms, I observe," he said as the landlady opened the front door and showed him up. "I think we might possibly spare you a room. Come in. Let me see. Do you smoke?" "Yes." "Is it on the top floor?" "Yes." "Is it large enough to contain my trunk and a chair and a bed at the same time?" "Hardly." "Is there a handle on the water pitcher?" "I think not." "Is the washstand minus one leg?" "I believe so." "Window looks down on the back yard, I presume—the back yard with barrels, well box and a heap of cans and bottles?" "Yes, sir." "Twenty-eight holes in the carpet on the floor?" "I have forgotten, but I think there are 28." "Piece of yellow soap in the dish, and a clean towel twice a week?" "Correct, sir." "Madam, I am a man of few words. I don't want the room." "Exactly, sir. I am a woman who can't afford to waste any time. It is evident that you have struck too high a plane. Good day! And she stood on the steps and watched him until he had turned the corner, and then said to herself: "He forgot to ask me if there were any drawers to the bureau, and I forgot to tell him there wasn't. Never mind, though—he is looking for a cheap place."—Detroit Free Press.

Had Seen It All.

One night while John McCollough was playing "Virginius" in Little Rock, a drunkard fellow from the hills, while standing at the foot of the opera house stairs was accosted by an acquaintance, who asked:

"Uncle Billy, are you going to see the show?"

"What sort o' a show is it, Lige?"

"Oaps o' them here actin' show, what uses an' women come out on a platform an' bow an' scrape."

"No bosses in it, Lige?"

"No bosses, Uncle Billy."

"Then I don't believe I'll go up. I got enough o' that sort o' thing when Abe Spillers's school shut down. We've seen all they can do. Come on here an' let's go round town what that feller is playin' a fiddle in a grocery."

Village Repartee.

Grocer—"Strainers, coffee strainers! Why, no, Mrs. Gabb, we don't keep them; but our coffee don't need straining if you know how to make it."

Customer (testily)—"Oh, don't you worry yourself about your coffee! I know how to make coffee a big sight better than you do. My coffee is clear as cider."

"Thank what do you want a strainer for?"

"For your sassy."

Why He Was Thankful.

Hub—Are you going to lay my new papal Accepted Suits—Yes, my dear child.

"Have you got your wig yet?"

"Wig! Why, my! I don't need a wig. Why do you ask?"

"My other pans always said he an thank! his hair wasn't fast to him."

"Yes; I shall break the engagement," she said, folding her arms and looking defiant. "It is really too much to have to converse with him; he's so dead as a post, and talks like he had a mouthful of bath. Jeeling, the man's hair and spite is disgusting." He'll break the engagement for that; tell him to take Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy. It will cure the complaint." "Well, I'll tell him. I do hate to break it off, for all other respects I'm quite too charming. Of course, I'm sorry he's so nasty."

OUR SCHOOLS.

Annual Commencement Exercises of Catholic Schools.

ST. MARY'S COLLEGE.

At St. Mary's College last Wednesday the second collegiate class of 86 passed a brilliant examination, and received their degrees. The exercises were very well attended by a goodly number of the friends and relatives of the students. The hall was tastefully decorated for the occasion with evergreens and lanterns of most unusual brilliancy, suspended from the chandeliers. The examinations were conducted by Rev. Brother Frederick, teacher of the class, and Rev. Brother Sabastian, Vice President of the College.

The examination was very satisfactory, the proficiency in all the studies in which they were examined, and reflected much credit on their teacher. The examinations were interspersed with music and some very pleasant recitations, producing a very agreeable variety to the entertainment. The following programme was then rendered: Essay, "Advance of the Circle," E. McNamara. Zither—Essay, "Causes of Sickness," J. M. Hyde; extract, "Julius Address," J. C. Parsons. Instrumental—Essay, "Gas or Electricity," T. O'Neill; extract "The Sentry," J. W. Kaye. Latin—Declamation, "Hannibal's Address," J. W. Hollaran; essay, "Water," A. L. Cutter. Chemistry—"A Harmless Tragic Fate," R. J. Rosney; essay, "Laughing," E. J. Pendergast. Essay, "Electricity," T. R. Hunt; essay, "Washington's Birthday," J. Rosney. Chemistry—Extract, "Rights of Free Discussion," J. J. Mc-Closkey; essay, "Electricity," J. J. Mc-Closkey. Violin solo, "Fantasia," M. Herr. Grand Finale, college orchestra.

Last Friday, the 29th ult., the twenty-second annual commencement of St. Mary's College took place in the virtual Opera House. The hall was filled from parquet to dome. Besides His Grace Most Rev. Archbishop Riordan several clergymen occupied seats in the proscenium boxes among whom we noticed Rev. Brother Botulph, President of the College, Ukiana and Hosea of Sacred Heart College; Rev. Brother Mary of St. Peter's, College of St. John's, Brother of St. Joseph's, Oakland; Rev. Father Brady, Superior of St. Joseph's, Oakland; St. Joseph's Gleaner of East Oakland, McNally and Cyril of West Oakland, Gallagher of St. Patrick's, Vallejo and Connolly of St. Mary's Cathedral, Sullivan of Mission Dolores, Kirby of Santa Rosa, Campos of San Leandro, Gallagher of the Immaculate Conception Church, Oakland, Scally of St. Mary's College, Herrington of St. Dominick's, Chabot of St. Joseph's, Oakland, Pablo, and Sagaret of St. Rose's, Rev. Brothers Lucian and Leonard of Oakland.

The exercises were announced for 7:30 P. M., and promptness at this hour was observed, upon which the proceedings by the 13, B. M. Mozart, Hayden, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Weber, Schubert, Chopin, Liszt, Thalberg, Gottschalk, Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart

A CORPUS CHRISTI LESSON.

BY REBECCA C. DONNELLY.

If some one came and told you, O my darling!
That in the little church across the way,
Our Lord was blessed with His sacrificial
And giving sadness the Hallowed day!

Our true and tried friend, the same much Jesus,
Who trod the streets of Nazareth of old,
And like Jerusalem went preaching, healing;
In sunshine or in storm, in heat or cold,

The same sweet Saviour, who, with gentle mercy,
Gave to the death their speech, the blind, their sight,
And to the deaf, their hearing; (open gleaming!
And bringing back the dead to life and light.

If some one told you that I said, you. He was wanting
His sunshine robe.—His face with love aglow—
The sunlight and other children had gone home
He was on Calvary, centuries ago.

That all who chose might gather there and greet
Christ of a Heart that for them burns and bleeds;
And, knowing all the Past, might kneeling kiss
And tell to Him their woes and pressing needs.

O, with what rapture your soul would leap
To look upon that miracle of bliss;
His robe to touch; upon His dear face gazing,
To press upon His feet your trembling, kiss

O, with what faith and terror you would tell Him
The story of your very grief and care,
Sure that He, in pity not to you intended,—
That, healing, He was pledged to grant you prayer.

Behold! I come to tell you, O my darling!
That, in the little church across the way,
In all our churches, all our shrines, my darling
This miracle is happening to-day.

To-day, and every day,—all times and seasons,
Our true and tried friend upon His throne,
In storm or sunshine, near or afar, unfailing
With love and tenderness awaits His own.

"If ye ask, believed!" Ah! He means to assure us
"I am the Truth,—I never can deceive;
The Life that I am, I will give to all My children,
Blessed are they, who, seeing not, believe!"

And, O, while burning tears fall fast and faster,
Answer, as pleading full of love and grief,—
"Pardon my feeble faith: O Lord and Master!
I do believe,—help Thou my unbelief!"

IDEAL BEAUTY.

You ask me, "what is a beautiful face?"
I learn not how the Inspiring Muse
The aim of poetic is perfect control—
The power of a faithful well-disciplined soul.

Eyes are beautiful when they ever beam
With those kindly and gentle looks, which seem
To spring from a heart so sheltered from strife
That such glance resembles an angel's smile.

Lips are beautiful when they are always smiling
When another's failings could be revealed,
And are ever ready to speak the praise
Of another's virtues and works and ways.

These are are beautiful which gladly lend
Assistance to a needy friend;
Ever, to promptly, your detraction's speech
That in jealous the one see no merit.

Hands are beautiful which willingly serve
The poor and afflicted whom hardship assaults;
And apply with tenderest care some balm
To ease the sufferer's pains to calm.

These feet are beautiful which daily wend
Their way to the needy whom none befriend,
And travel in search of the healthful poor
Who would fain, in secret, their wants endure.

And you ask me to point with an that beauty?
Make charity's true fold law your first duty;
And, to keep full well this mysterious law,
You have only to study our Lord's Divine Home.—

Literary Miscellany.

BY ROSE KAVANAGH.

The broad Atlantic seemed to lie there as still as the sky during that windless era of Summer; and if you were to see the Atlantic in its best or worst mood, from the Irish coast, go down to Donegal, turn your back on Derry, and stand out amid the crags on Bunerana with your face to the West.

But it was in a good mood this evening, and the sun was hurrying down to meet it, the mountains along the Foyle were already gathering in the purple shadows to their breasts; a seagull sitting on the vest, wet strand had a long and slender shadow at its feet, and a little boy who were hovering about on the rocky point which the headland of Lough Swuta cut to the ocean looked not much bigger than seagulls from the shore.

Only they were not as white, said Kevin O'Neil to himself as he moored his boat under the cliff at Lough and went ashore to wait for the rising of the tide. He had not conjectured what they were doing out there, and yet it was not a work unknown last year in Donegal and elsewhere—they were gathering their supper of seaweed.

The woman was middle-age—the boy little more than a child; in his own small way he was helping her to pull up the softest kinds of the brown laver, and then, when her basket was full, she turned to go with the sugan. "Come Mike," she said, little why was answered her. The next instant she was on her knees beside the rock from which the lad had fallen.

He cheek was cut and, as she afterward discovered, his shoulder dislocated; but at first she was conscious of nothing, only that she was holding him dead in her arms. And not ten minutes before he had climbed up that final step, he had called out to her that he was hungry, and she had tossed up to him a Slaneh of the brown dulisk!

The blood was coming down on his ragged jacket; she pressed her lips to it—to the wounded cheek—to his closed eye; and the tears were streaming down to her bare and withered neck. "He is dead—Mother of God, my son is dead!" she cried aloud in Irish pressing him the closer to her breast, as she swayed back and forward on her knees in the Celtic way of cure, during either sorrow or devotion.

All around was solitude the most intense; not even the wings of a bird stirred through the air. Poor Mary Doherty did not do what, perhaps, a more civilized woman would have done—run home for help—but she crouched there before the rock, the boy against her bosom and she lifted up her voice and kissed him with that self-known and wildest of wails.

For the first time in his life Kevin O'Neil heard it; he started to his feet, ran down the slope to his boat. The boat was now bobbing about on the turgid tide. Lough Foyl was surrounded with water, and the woman with the boy in her arms was standing erect on the rock from which Mike fell.

But she was not keening now; she was murmuring something in Irish rapidly and incoherently, and her eyes, were uptorned to the luminous sky. The boy's head was moving against her neck, and now and again he uttered a sharp little cry of pain.

"After all, I may be some use in life," said Kevin O'Neil to himself, as a lad dozen strokes brought his boat out to them. "Hallo, you were caught by the tide, weren't you?" as he held his arms for the child.

But she shook her head, sad, stiff curlying him herself, get in.

"Yes," she explained as they shot back to the shore. "I was caught by the tide. I thought Mike was killed, and forgot the tide. God heard me. Look, sir—he is only a little hurted."

"I heard you, too. I'm all hurted. You cryin' wakened me, mammy—that an' the seed gain away. We lost it all, mammy," Mike declared. "When what that on the strand? It's Minny and Bess and Miss O'Kane."

"My two little girls and Miss O'Kane," explained the woman. "I could not hurry so many, sir, only for Miss O'Kane."

Kevin O'Neil looked with a good deal of interest at the lady who aided Mrs. Doherty in her maternal duties.

This was easy enough to do, for it was questionable if she was not looking at him.

She had instantly taken off her thick jacket, and, folding it about Mike, took him gently from his mother's arms. Kevin thought her very young looking for such serious schemeanish as Miss Doherty described. She could not be so very strong either; her figure looked quite slim; her hands and feet were small. It was rather a fine face she had, but her mouth and eyes looked as if they could express a great deal of thought as well as feeling.

Then he suddenly started after her, relating that this was his work she was doing. The mother and other children had gone on to light a fire.

"Oh, thank you," said Miss O'Kane, as she relinquished her burden. "I did not think of you. Now, Mike, be a man and a soldier."

"Of course not," said O'Neil promptly; "but I want to be of use. Sorrow he said it was quite evident she did not think of him. As her father Miss was fain to bed, his shoulder set to rights by the young man, whom knowledge of anatomy stood him in good stead here.

When the lad's mother was high in the heavens he walked home through the dark green fields with Miss O'Kane and Bessie, and the two who had never seen each other before were talking as confidentially as if they had been friends, before many of the sweet wild-thyme-covered trees were in blossom.

"Although I lived nearly all my life abroad," declared Kevin, "my name—indeed my two names—were of something to attract to me. It was to see the inauguration stone of our cities in the Rock of Doire, come to Easter. I learned Davis' lines about 'The O'Neill asleep as on his feet the Lord's Prayer':

"Twice looked he to heaven with thanks and prayer,
Twice to his borders with sentinel and spy
To the wave of Lough Neagh, the bright of Strabane,
And thrice on his allies, and thrice on his clan:—

"'Wann! it a pity you were not at Lough Hugh," she said, "or Shane, or Owen?" Shane the Proud was always a great hero of mine. Wouldn't you like to see him coming down the tide of earl at the foot of Einshesh, and saying as he raised his haughty head and shook his oculin slowly, 'If you are Queen of England, I am The O'Neil, King of Ulster!'"

Kevin looked down at her enthusiastic face, and wondered why he did not notice at first how pretty she was. The soft pink of her cheeks, the glowing gray eyes, every curve and every tint of her face was perfect, he thought. And then she was so conscious of it, and unknown in earnest about what she was saying!

"Yes," he said eagerly, "and I would like also to hear him say he would not 'sprike his mouth with English tongue.' Ah, he was as difficult whom hardship conquered, and apply with tenderest care some balm to ease the sufferer's pains to calm.

These feet are beautiful which daily wend Their way to the needy whom none befriend, And travel in search of the healthful poor Who would fain, in secret, their wants endure.

And you ask me to point with an that beauty? Make charity's true fold law your first duty; And, to keep full well this mysterious law, You have only to study our Lord's Divine Home.—San Francisco, 22nd ult.

Literary Miscellany.

BY ROSE KAVANAGH.

The broad Atlantic seemed to lie there as still as the sky during that windless era of Summer; and if you were to see the Atlantic in its best or worst mood, from the Irish coast, go down to Donegal, turn your back on Derry, and stand out amid the crags on Bunerana with your face to the West.

But it was in a good mood this evening, and the sun was hurrying down to meet it; the mountains along the Foyle were already gathering in the purple shadows to their breasts; a seagull sitting on the vest, wet strand had a long and slender shadow at its feet, and a little boy who were hovering about on the rocky point which the headland of Lough Swuta cut to the ocean looked not much bigger than seagulls from the shore.

Only they were not as white, said Kevin O'Neil to himself as he moored his boat under the cliff at Lough and went ashore to wait for the rising of the tide. He had not conjectured what they were doing out there, and yet it was not a work unknown last year in Donegal and elsewhere—they were gathering their supper of seaweed.

The woman was middle-age—the boy little more than a child; in his own small way he was helping her to pull up the softest kinds of the brown laver, and then, when her basket was full, she turned to go with the sugan. "Come Mike," a tiny little cry was answered her. The next instant she was on her knees beside the rock from which the lad had fallen.

He cheek was cut and, as she afterward discovered, his shoulder dislocated; but at first she was conscious of nothing, only that she was holding him dead in her arms. And not ten minutes before he had climbed up that final step, he had called out to her that he was hungry, and she had tossed up to him a Slaneh of the brown dulisk!

The blood was coming down on his ragged jacket; she pressed her lips to it—to the wounded cheek—to his closed eye; and the tears were streaming down to her bare and withered neck. "He is dead—Mother of God, my son is dead!" she cried aloud in Irish pressing him the closer to her breast, as she swayed back and forward on her knees in the Celtic way of cure, during either sorrow or devotion.

All around was solitude the most intense; not even the wings of a bird stirred through the air. Poor Mary Doherty did not do what, perhaps, a more civilized woman would have done—run home for help—but she crouched there before the rock, the boy against her bosom and she lifted up her voice and kissed him with that self-known and wildest of wails.

For the first time in his life Kevin O'Neil heard it; he started to his feet, ran down the slope to his boat. The boat was now bobbing about on the turgid tide. Lough Foyl was surrounded with water, and the woman with the boy in her arms was standing erect on the rock from which Mike fell.

But she was not keening now; she was murmuring something in Irish rapidly and incoherently, and her eyes, were uptorned to the luminous sky. The boy's head was moving against her neck, and now and again he uttered a sharp little cry of pain.

"After all, I may be some use in life," said Kevin O'Neil to himself, as a lad dozen strokes brought his boat out to them. "Hallo, you were caught by the tide, weren't you?" as he held his arms for the child.

But she shook her head, sad, stiff curlying him herself, get in.

"Yes," she explained as they shot back to the shore. "I was caught by the tide. I thought Mike was killed, and forgot the tide. God heard me. Look, sir—he is only a little hurted."

"I heard you, too. I'm all hurted. You cryin' wakened me, mammy—that an' the seed gain away. We lost it all, mammy,

It was curious to hear far talking about life and love to another young girl who was about to get married next week from Christmas Day. And now was Christmas Eve, when they stood alone, upon Lough Foyl shore, standing, windless Winter evening, the western sky full of red streaks of light, the sun shrunk back to a long thread against the horizon, a little, young scholar of a man making a faint path of silver over the west land. Lessing against a crag, the two young girls watched that wide, lonesome lake, and Alice was talking seriously.

"Whether it was a lion or a giant to be love, Mary," she was simply saying; "well, a giant—you, certainly—a giant, no matter how much pain may go along with it. It is a fact of your nature that gets rooted and finished, and then one is left stronger and more confident of life and its struggles.

And you know what happiness it is, Mary," she said, but then was a faint sadness in her voice, "to sit alone and think of him, and wonder what he is doing, and how he looks, narrow and cold and hard like as he before he came, and how strong through that woman and how through one's heart have some reference to him. You know the hope of meeting him, or the memory of parting from him, makes one remain awake for hours; or if you do sleep, you wake again and can sleep no more for happiness. It is a great way to be," she said with a full sob, "but I suppose one can't help it." She dropped her face on her hands, and as we did a somebody touched her. It was her companion; it was Kevin O'Neil who was kneeling beside her and comforting with the wisdom which comes of experience, directly adjacent. There were many explanations.

"If you know whom I am," he asked later on, when she could listen calmly, "I was in jail, Alice. I was arrested the night before I came to your assistance."

"A suspect, Hugh?" a village coffin? Don't tell me any more at present; I am dizzy with pride of you my head will get," Alice answered. "Well, I was at my desk playing hide-and-seek in her dinner, and I was given three mots. "Why, that is magnificent, Hugh; you could have had a higher honor paid you; Fithink! But you might have let poor me share a scarcely you kept all the glory to yourself, sir, only for my help. Well, I was at my desk playing coming to for the reflection. Why didn't you write to me, Hugh?"

"I could not give my own name, because I was a suspect at all," he said, with a smile illuminating his face. "Do you understand, Alice? They would like to hang me, perhaps; or else to kill me slowly in one of their English dungeons, that do kill so many of our poor fellows. I did not mind the imprisonment a bit, of course. You know we say one so rapidly suspected, though, this morning after I left you I stepped into the Land Court, during the trial of those poor Leonah help burners case. It was the priest who represented them; I believe most of them were too poor to go to the town—most of them had no shoes, many of them don't know one word of English—and I listened to the priest pleading their cause. Alice, when something happened that made a keen impression on me. It was when the priest, suggesting, with simple dignity, replied to the flippant cross-examination of their landlord's counsel. 'My lair has grown gray in their service,' said the priest, 'but I do knows how willingly I could lay the world for them. Ireland is a world, and up in my heart, Alice, and, before I could stop myself, they were spoken aloud in the court—'Ireland! Ireland! Ireland!

MISSION OF THE CATHOLIC PRESS.

"Journalism is the greatest social power, because it is the chief agent in popularizing knowledge, and popularizing knowledge is the chief work of the age in this world. In our time, religious journalism is already a useful and serious occupation, not only a work indispensable to the welfare of society, but a work of apostolic dignity. What is and what ought to be the effect of the Catholic press upon the Catholic mind, and through it upon the world, whenever it may be conducted, the Catholic truth."—BROWSON, THE CATHOLIC HOME AND CHRISTIANITY.

Why not hasten and direct through the instrumentality of the Catholic Publisher, under whose production they sub to the world, the Catholic Home and Christianity, the Catholic Press of religion, its rights and duties of the Holy Apostolic See, and adhere to its doctrines and precepts with devotion and fidelity.—Pius IX.

Editorial Notes.

—The Catholics of the United States pay their proportion every year to the millions of dollars squandered on the Godless public schools, while they educate 500,000 of their children in parochial schools.

—John W. Potter, a Democratic leader in Northern Illinois, the owner of daily newspapers at Freeport and Rock Island, Ill., and founder of the Eagle at Cork, Ireland, died on May 24th.

—Somebody, remembering Russia's strength on land and England's on sea, has defined a war between the two as "the fight of a bear and a shark." The epigram is neat; and what decent man ever felt sympathy with a shark?

—A telegram from Rome to the Popular Gazette of College announces that Archbishop Malchers will be created Cardinal at the next Consistory. In such an event his Eminence will take up his residence in the Eternal City.

—The personal property of Mrs. Delia T. S. Parnell, mother of the Irish leader, has been seized, at the suit of Joshua J. Turner and others, and was sold on June 1, at Ironside, near Bordentown, N. J. Mrs. Parnell still remains an invalid at Dr. Murphy's hospital, Washington, D. C.

—Archbishop Kenrick of St. Louis, who is in his 79th year, recently administered the Sacrament of Confirmation in three separate churches on the same day. The wonderful vitality of the aged Prelate encourages his people to hope for many years of life and usefulness for him yet.

—The Bishops of Dalmatia have sent to the Holy Father an address in which they deplore the have adopted against the Church, and the fresh blow struck at the liberty of the Sovereign Pontiff, by the Italian authorities, in prohibiting processions of the Holy Viaticum through the streets of Rome.

—The Dublin Freeman's Journal asserts that the Rev. Dr. Walsh of Maynooth College will shortly be appointed Archbishop of Dublin by the Pope. The Pope, it says further, has declared that he has not seen Mr. Errington, the semi-official representative of England, or, at least, only once; see him again.

—Michael M. Phelan, recently appointed Consul General of the United States at Halifax, is the brother of Father Phelan, editor of our sister contemporary the St. Louis Watchman, a paper that constantly keeps all the Protestant press in that region undergoing the pains and penalties of an earthly purgatory.

—The New York Sun greeted the new issue of the Bible as "The Ruined Bible." Next day the editor explained that the writer of the article in question wrote "The Revised Bible." In this case the intelligent compositor set up better than he knew, and was far ahead of the unintelligent writer. The revised Bible is as much ruined as was the King James version.

—An ex-United States officer, agent of a Quilting gun manufactory in Connecticut, hired himself out as a wholesale butcher to the Canadian Government, and, by skillful manipulation of his deadly machine, achieved at Batoucha a most decisive victory over the "rebels." The Americans made the conquest of the place, but Gen. Middleton was on hand in time to capture the glory.

—Some friend has sent us a copy of the California Missionary, published at Visalia, in which we find some comments made by the Christian Advocate upon the prayers to this Mother of God issued as the May supplement to the Monitor. We have filed the Christian Advocate away for next week, when the charges of "idolatry" brought against us by the Advocate will be fully met and refuted.

—In many cities of Southern Germany, a solemn procession is held on Holy Saturday evening in honor of the Resurrection. It was this time, after a lapse of sixteen years, that the recently elected Mayor, Dr. Steidle, a devout Catholic, renewed the ancient custom of the chief magistrate taking his place in the procession, wearing the insignia of his office. It was his predecessor, the liberal Mayor Herr Zasrn, who had abolished this pious usage of several centuries.

—The Western Watchman says Who will talk of old pioneers now? On the 16th of March last Father Donato Mussian died in the village of Pranze, in Southern Tyrol, in the 102d year of his age and seventy-ninth of his priesthood. He has been pastor of the village seventy-six years and was able to perform most of his pastoral duties up to the time of his death. He was born two years before the battle of Bunker Hill and is therefore older than the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States.

—Recent people throughout the country are interested in the war which is being waged in many cities on the vile pictorals, that are used to advertise certain plays. Rev. Father McGoldrick, of Minneapolis, took practical action last week by issuing out warrants against a bill-poster and a theatrical agent on charges of posting indecent pictures. Such offenders do much to justify the charge that the stage is immoral, and the respectable members of the profession should be operists with all friends of decency in punishing those who so insult public purity.

—Irish creeks will now come into demand as a fashionable addition to every American household desirous of following the Presidential fashion, for the reason that President Cleveland's grandfather was Richard Kennan. She has been employed about the White House since President Cleveland has been there, and went from Albany with him.

—"It is no wonder," said Rev. J. J. White, in a recent discourse, "that more girls are not led astray. Mothers should be the confidantes of their daughters in love affairs. It amazes me when I find senseless fops and dudes encouraged in the house by mothers who have marriageable daughters. Yet when these girls go off and marry these fops said dudes a great sensation is made of it. The ruins of marriages are often trivial. A beautiful mustache will win a girl's hand for a fop. Young men who have nothing to do should be shunned by girls. One of the most damnable institutions of the age is flirtation. It is the cause of most of the unhappy marriages of the day. The flirt can not be a wife to whom a man can put confidence. God save good men from them. Another cause is the love of dress. Women love of dress drives many from marrying. Young men have given this as a cause to me why they have not married, and yet I know men who are supported by their wives.

—In discussing the status of the Catholic young men of this country, the Catholic Examiner says: "The Catholics of America are intelligent. Even their enemies admit that. And yet the number of Catholic newspapers in this country (and they are paying dividends on almost) is counted on the fingers of a single hand; there are nearly 10,000,000 of Catholics in America, and yet the total circulation of all these newspaper exceeds that of the Police Gazette by only one third. Catholic publishers are failing, and Catholic writers, who modify persist in catering to their own people, are being allowed to starve to death. There are nearly 10,000,000 of Catholics in this country, and the Constitution declares they are the equals of other citizens. In some respects this is true. They are allowed to vote, to become aldermen, or occasionally even mayors or congressmen, and if they are willing to pass as "representative Catholics" they can command their price in political campaigns. In these respects, it is true, they are quite on a par with other citizens. But it is also true that in a large number of States of this great, and glorious, and free republic a priest cannot enter a public institution to administer the consolations of religion to Catholics within their walls. In the State of New York, where there are 1,700,000 of these free Catholics, a bill to extend to them religious privileges without distinction was recently vetoed by the Governor.

Death of Daniel T. Murphy.

The Church of God mourns over the departure of her exemplary children just—as in the natural order—parents mourn over the demise of their best beloved. And thus it is that in the death of Daniel T. Murphy the Church of God has lost one who on to lament the decease of one of her most generous sons, one of her most charitable, most zealous and most faithful children.

Mr. Murphy was a man who was in the fullest sense of the word a man of his word, and in his intercourse with his fellow-men he was ever the soul of honor. He

NOBODY REALLY CARES.

If you're anything to grieve you,
And fill your heart with care,
If Poverty hides near you,
Or if your feet are clamped by taxes,
Or if you deal with uncle dispatching
Or have a case in court,
Don't say a word about it, for
Nobody really cares.

If health and strength forsake you,
And joy and gladness flee,
A gloom that clouds the sunshine
And shadows everything,
Why you feel that let so empty
But neither mortal heart,
Don't say a word about it, for
Nobody really cares.

The world is full of pleasure,
Aye, take it as it has,
To selfly bored unless you
Meet it with smile and jest;
It pays to see Want's complainer,
At Sorrow oddly scared,
So never tell your trouble, for
Nobody really cares.

Talking About Our Neighbor.

St. Bernard calls the detractor's tongue a two-edged, sharp, a three-edged sword, with which he commits three murders at one stroke.

The detractor, in the first place, murders his own soul when he destroys his neighbor's fair fame. Secondly, he murders the character of the person he detracts, for he destroys that evil life by which he lived blameless and esteemed by others. Thirdly he murders the souls of those who listen with pleasure to the detraction; and encourage and spread it around; for whoever assents, sage and grave ear to the detraction, is equally criminal with the detractor.

And more than all this, St. Bernard says he knows not which of the two merits condemnation the most—the detractor or the willing listener, since both have the evil one in them—the one in his mouth, and the other in his ears.

Detraction is, too, a base and cowardly vice; for when we detract our neighbor, we stab his reputation behind his back, and at a time when he has not an opportunity of defending himself.

A remarkable bishop entertained one day, at his table, one who was prone to detraction. He was serenely seated when he commenced speaking in disrespectful terms of a person in the neighborhood. At this the bishop was not a little displeased, and, intending to give the detractor a lesson, he called out to one of his servants, and told him to go to the house of the person who had just been spoken of in a very nonchalant manner, and tell him that the bishop wished to speak to him. The detractor hearing the order given, became very much alarmed, and tried to indorse the bishop so revoke the order. The prelate calmly replied: "I am sending for this gentleman that he may be able to answer the charges you have brought against him; for it would not be just to listen to the complaints which you have made against his without affording and opportunity of defending himself."

Detraction is, therefore, a grievous sin; and is in not without reason that the book of Proverbs declares the detractor to be the abomination of men.

Besides this declaration from Scripture, it may be observed, that to speak ill of our neighbor is quite contrary to the example of our Saviour, who was so tender of the reputation of others, that He would not discover who it was that was to betray Him, though it gave Him so much pain, but allowed even Judas to receive the holy Communion unworthily rather than discover his crime to the other apostles; and though He knew that in a few hours after, he would be discovered to the whole nation.

"Good Man's Wish.

[illegible] "There is one who was a real friend to me, and privately warned me of the dangers of the young; no one knew it, but he aided me in the time of need. I saw what I am to him." Or would rather have some widow, with choking utterance, telling her she is blest? "There is my true friend and more. He visited me in my affliction, and found you, my son, an employer, and you, my daughter, a happy home in a virtuous husband." I say I would rather that such a person would stand at my grave than to have erected over it the most beautiful sculptured monument of Parian or Italian marble. The heart's broken utterance of reflections of past kindness, and the tears of grateful memory shed upon the grave, are more valuable in my estimation than the most costly cenotaph ever reared.

What an Ear will do.

For burns and scalds nothing is more soothing than the white of an egg, which may be poured over the wound. It is solid as a varnish for a burn than collodion, and being always at hand can be applied immediately. It is also more cooling than the sweet oil and cotton which was formerly supposed to be the surest application to ease by the smarting pain. It is the contact with the air which gives the extreme discomfort experienced from the ordinary accident of this kind, and anything that excludes the air and prevents inflammation is the thing to be at once applied. The egg is also considered one of the best remedies for dysentery. Beaten up slightly, with or without sugar, and swallowed at a gulp, it tends, by its emollient qualities, to lessen the inflammation of the stomach and intestines, and, by forming a transient coating on these organs, to enable nature to recover her healthful sway over a diseased body. Two, or at the most three eggs per day, would be all that is required in ordinary cases, and since the egg is not merely medicine but food as well, the lighter the diet otherwise and the quieter the patient is kept the more certain and rapid is the recovery.

Notes.

— The rhubarb plant requires so little labor in its cultivation, and is at once so healthful and delicious, that every garden should contain a supply for home use. With the exception of forking up in the Spring, and working in manure once every season, rhubarb plants require little attention and they have remained in the same spot five or six years. At the end of this time they should be divided, and put in new soil.

— The indiscriminate use of tincture of arnica for petty sprains and bruises of horses is scientifically condemned. It has been demonstrated that if kept long in contact with affected surfaces arnica produces lasting and blistering, thus frequently aggravating the complaint sought to be cured.

— Great care should be exercised in changing the stock in grass in spring. The fresh grass acts as a powerful cathartic and weakens the animals, especially the young stock. The first day's pasturage should not exceed an hour.

— Stables and pens should be airy and well ventilated, but not drafty. Place a horse or other animal that is warm from exercise, in a stall where a draft will strike, and injury most surely follows to the health of the beast.

— Oats and potatoes feed a congenial bed in a cool, moist ground.

— Raging grapes is now generally approved by growers.

— "Dr. Henley's Celery Beef and Iron," most efficient nervine and Tonic ever offered to the public, at Grocerdie will testify

"To Have and to Hold."

A prominent Episcopal clergyman was invited to one of the hotels in Detroit to marry a couple from Canada. They did not want any witnesses, and they wanted the ceremony to be about one minute long. To this the reverend gentleman objected. Under the law of the State a marriage is not valid unless witnessed by two persons. They were procured, and the couple struck an attitude calculated to show to advantage a shady ring, fine clothes, and two rather good looking faces, the owners of which would (to the marriage certificate stated) never see their twenty sixth birth day again. The ceremony ran smoothly until the pledges were given.

"I, Kate," continued the minister.

"I, Kate," she faltered.

"Take thee, William,"

"I take thee, William,"

"To be my wedded husband,"

"To be my wedded husband,"

"To have and to hold—"

A smile dimpled into the corner of her mouth, which was finally extended in a hearty laugh no response. The minister was astounded at the untimely exhibition of frivolity; the witnesses were highly amused, and the would-be bridegroom struggled to retain his self possession.

"To have and to hold—" repeated the minister.

"To have—To hold—" and she broke down again. A repetition of the former scene was broken into by the solemn and commanding voice.

"To have and to hold—"

"To—" she began; then indulged in a frenzy of mirth which spread to all but the dignified and chagrined part of the audience.

"You think this a very trivial matter," he said, sternly. "Perhaps it is to you. Good is so funny if you intend beginning life together in this ridiculous manner. I have a mind to punish you by refusing to complete the ceremony, but on second thought I think it will be better to read you a homily, and then I will finish that which I have begun if I have to stay here until 8 o'clock next morning."

The homily was delivered, and the couple now quite serious, resumed their trying position, and were duly married.

"I wouldn't have laughed," said the bride, by way of explanation, "but I never heard the Episcopal marriage ceremony before, and it was so funny to think that I had got to promise to hold that great big fellow all the rest of my life, that I couldn't keep from laughing."

Two Cautious Women.

"All women are alike in their fear of the cars," said an Illinois Central conductor. "They carry their caution to absurd extremes. That reminds me of a little story. Down in the southern part of the State we have up at road crossings some of the old fashioned signs, 'Look out for the cars when the bell rings.'

"A lady driving along the other day stopped to a buggy. They had an argument and couldn't agree. The lady finally read the sign aloud:

"'Stop, and one, 'I hear a bell;'
got out, listened, looked, and then took hold of the animal's bridle, other one tightened her grip on the lines,
set her jaw, and prepared for the worst.
They looked anxiously up the track for the train, but still couldn't see it, though they could hear the bell a little plainer than before.
They waited and waited.

"Five minutes passed, then ten, and still no train. The old lady was so alarmed she wanted to turn back to the crossing, threatened to throw them into hysterics.
Nearer and nearer came the bell signal which they now warned them, and so they stood still.

"In about a quarter of an hour an old brindle cow came walking down the pasture by the side of the track, chewing her cud and monotonously jingling her bell. Ding of the woman cried from nervousness, and the other got out at the railroad company, and said they were nothing but mean old monopolies anyway."

Strong Circumstantial Evidence.

"John Henry, don't you come near me, and keep those shirts like hotel clerk diamonds. "You are false, false as city milk. Who is she? Who is she! That creature, Mrs. Dash?"

"Really, my love, you amaze me. Mrs. Dash is a charming lady, as everybody knows, but I have not seen her since she called on you at this house. I have not been calling on any one, I assure you, my dear. I have been down in the dish as usual. You never accused me of anything of the kind before.

"No," she replied, bitly, "I never had a chance, but now, now the proof stares me in the face. You have been to the clinch. You have been calling on a lady, you see it in your white vagrants. You false, bald headed old lecturer. Boo-hoo."

"My appearance?"

"Yes, you are—are—boo-hoo! sober." And she rushed off to get a divorce.

Visiting Brother—Last Sunday! Why, I saw by the papers that it stormed here terribly last Sunday.

"Yes; as the saying is, it rained pitchforks all day long."

"And yet you say that your church was crowded?"

"Yes."

"How do you account for it?"

"Well, you see, the weather was so bad that they had to postpone the rain."

A FEW WORDS TO GIRLS.

A lady of intelligence and observation has remarked, "I wish I could impress upon the minds of the girls that the field of woman is not to marry young."

It girls could only be brought to believe that their chances for a happy marriage were better after twenty than before, there would be less misery in the world than there now is. To be sure, they might not have so many opportunities to marry after that age as before, but as they do not need to marry but one at a time, it is enough that one should be satisfactory. As a girl grows older, if she thinks at all, she certainly becomes more capable of judging what will make her happy than when younger. How many girls of twenty would think of accepting the man they would gladly have married at fourteen! At twenty a woman is reasonably independent, and not over-anxious to marry, is much better able to judge and more careful in her choice than one of twenty. There is good reason for this. Her mind has improved with her years, and she now looks beyond mere appearance in judging of men. She is apt to ask if the man who is a very polite in company, is really kind and good. Does this polite action spring from a happy, genial nature? or is his attention dictated by a desire of collecting admiration, and laid at home as he lays of his hand?

A young girl taken it for granted that men are good, and treat them in a lively, polite, friendly, and on their good behavior. Her instinctively is like the one who happens to live next door to her, who she knows, and has had a long acquaintance with. Her manner that in nine cases out of ten is a true index of the man's character, and if she is right, it is very seldom that a girl of fifteen or twenty is wrong in her judgment of character in some way, and though she may try to laugh it off, the wound is there, and festers and corrodes till the life has ebbed away, and she is a lost soul. Ah, how sad, which she thinks her life is ruined by marriage. It is a mistake to think that the life of a married woman is sadder than that of a single one. The married woman is generally happier.

Let mothers treasure their daughters more, seek to learn their innost feelings in a kind and sympathetic way, win their love and confidence by showing that they know, were once girls and often made use of the same. A girl who has a mother for a true friend is not so anxious to leave the shelter of her home to take "the leap in the dark." For what is it but a leap in the dark? Young as she is, she knows that she is not so many. How many women can truly say, "my marriage has been all I expected, and that I hoped. I have married the man my girlhood, and my heart is entirely satisfied?" Has anything come of your dreams? But on the contrary they say, "we have not expected much in life, and have such satisfaction in something more and better than we had hoped for." Is not this enough? Is not this satisfaction to something more and better than we had hoped for." Is not this enough? Is not this satisfaction to something more and better than we had hoped for." Is not this enough? Is not this satisfaction to diplomatic questions. The excursation was soon repeated outside, and many here laughed heartily over Mgr. Manotti's discomfiture. Cardinal Jacobini and the Pope have chided him for his uncivil attitude. Ever since then he has preserved a discreet silence in the presence of the Irish Bishops. He, however, deserves some indulgence, for the English party here in Rome try to get hold of all the influential prelates and to stuff their minds with the most absurd reports. This party got hold of Manotti, overestimating his influence with the Pope, "whom he sees every day! Manotti is fond of the English, whose language he is trying to learn. A galaxy of English ladies is moving constantly around him in order to give sermons for their friends, and they have poisoned his pious mind with an English version of Irish affairs. The poor Monsignor, so pious and so simple, sees a dynamiter in every Irishman and a rebel in every Irish clergyman.

THE SERAFINSTINIAN PARTY

is well served by a set of old maids and young widows, who treat among their social positions, blood connections, and personal attractions to put everything to flight that may help the cause of England and injure that of Ireland. Patriotic clergymen and prelates are personally attacked, and so are their friends or those who sympathise with them. This female cohorts is now trying to defeat the election of Dr. Walsh because he is agreeable to the clergy and to the people of Ireland. Every possible means is used by them to influence the Pope and the Cardinals, and they coax, bribe and threaten alternately. This explains why the English party has sometimes succeeded in snatching from the mouths and pens of high personages documents and letters which perhaps would not have been written after cool and mature consideration.

But now the play is known even in the Vatican. Leo XIII. is fully aware of the tricks and traps used to frustrate the Christian policy. Unhappily for Mr. Errington, his master has lately become such an intimate friend of Signor Mancini that the Vatican cannot have anything to do with him. He is an ally of those who are keeping the Church in Italy in slavery. As long as the African question lasts Italy and England together Mr. Gladstone would do well to keep Mr. Errington at home.

The dinner given by Cardinal Jacobini was a great success. There were no toasts. Cardinals Lavigerie, Franchi, the two Jacobinis, Bilmont, and Rampolla were present. Cardinal Howard, of course, was not invited. The Bishops, including Kirby of the Irish College, were all there, and three Vicar Apostolics from Asia. Of the Papal Chamberlains, Mgr. Theodoli, Scotti, Galeati, and Macchi were there. The Cardinal Secretary of State did the honors with his wonted cordiality. The dinner lasted three hours. No lagers were served. The relatives of his Eminence and his personnel composed the dining room.

The Hotel de la Minerve is an Irish hotel just now. At night, after dinner, the prelates visit the front yard of the house and stroll up and down the public. The best spirit prevails at dinner, the table d'hote being regularly attended by a few English guests. Some of them have left their apartments in the city and have taken rooms in the hotel. Perhaps they want to enjoy the company of the Bishops, but many think that they want to watch them not too closely.

THE CROSS AND BEADS.

"Take, soldier, all thou dost behold
Here sought is worth our strife,
For silver have I not nor gold,
And, if thou will, my life.
I am very old—thou seest old
Will soon be mixed my low,
For wife and children are with God,
But spare my Beads and Cross.

"These beads I've fairly counted o'er
Ere since I was a boy
In tender mercies implore,
And thanks return in joy—
To her who fondly for all cares,
And for the alone pleads;
And she has been my friend; then leave
The poor old man his Beads!

And when to earth by sorrow wedded,
I lay down my head
Upon the cold turf and prayed
To Him who died thereon;
How light to what He suffered there
Was grief for earthly loss!
And I have clasped my beads to bear—
Then spare the old man's Cross!"

"Nay father, for thine humble home
Fear not, I will not come;
As thou, in true, but do not come
The helpless to despoil.
Wretches are not robbers; and
Thy Cross and Beads are safe
For gallant hearts are in our land
That love the Cross and Beads."

Literary Miscellany.

Miss Adeline's Mirror.

A PRUNTARED ELOPEMENT.

At midnight, when all in the house were asleep, Pauline Gray arose from her bed and let the lamp burn, for she knew positively, lest she should arouse her parents, who slept in an adjoining room; or her sisters, who were in the apartment above; and her face was pale with agitation.

Having arranged her hair carefully, she dressed herself in a grey travelling costume, took from her bureau a purse and a small travelling bag already packed, counted the money in her purse, and looked at the watch which she took from the pocket on the wall. It was half-past twelve.

"It half an hour," she said to herself. "He will be here at one o'clock. Half an hour to wait!"

She sat down on the side of the bed, and drew a letter from her bosom, and re-perusing it, re-read for the twentieth time the following passages:

"My DARLING—Since your parents are so cruel, we will take our fate into our own hands. Meet me at one o'clock, at the corner of the street at the church steps. I will have a carriage waiting. Before we can be discovered you will be my wife. Fear nothing. Trust yourself to me. Your own true lover,

ALFRED."

"Will he always be true to me? Will he be true? Why should he not? Why should he not? Then she remembered how dear her happy home had always been until he came. She fancied his mother's face when, in the morning, she had found her daughter's bed empty, and knew that she had left home secretly in the night. She could almost hear the city; see the pallid coal over her face. And her sisters—her little sisters—they would come stamping down the stairs, wondering, frightened, saying in their shrill innocent little voices, "Where has Lorna gone?" And Mamma! Had she taken her on his knee and kissed her only an hour before, the father who loved her so Pauline began to tremble. Tears rolled down her cheeks. She strove to steel herself with the thought that her parents had been cruel to her; that they had forbidden Alfred the house. Passion, all powerful, swept everything before it. Her lover had called her to follow him, and she would obey, whatever the consequences.

"Alfred, Alfred, do you know what I am doing for your sake? she sobbed.

She tore her sash from its hiding-place and looked at it again. How slowly the time limped on. She dared not venture into the midnight streets until she knew that Alfred would be there to protect her. But how should she know, poor creature in the last—how, after all, leave home!

"If you were only here, Alfred," she sobbed. "Only here to give me strength. My darling Alfred, my darling Alfred!"

Then she was silent, with a dread upon her for which she had no words; for, without say sound of step or opening door, a woman had entered, and stood before her, looking at her—a pale woman, all in white, who looked at her, and seemed to say, in some strange way, without a voice:

"Alfred is his name—Alfred! They have many names, and they are all alike. He was named Arthur. My darling Arthur. I met so I died one sixty years ago."

Pauline, she sat unable to stand, supported herself against the wall.

"Who are you?" she whispered. "Why why do you come to me?"

"I am Adeline," replied the figure, in the same strange way, "and I room to ask you to look in the mirror before you go—the old mirror in the recess yonder. Look and remember what you see there. Remember! Remember!"

Pauline, seized by fatally, almost insupportable of the exertion, turned towards the recess in which the dim mirror—a hundred years old—was placed, and, sinking into a chair before it, fixed her eyes upon its surface. Slow and crossed with a thousand cracks.

At first she saw nothing. Then the surface of the glass became clear as that of a still lake, and a beautiful face looked at her from under a pile of soyantish pifts and curls; and she saw a girl tying the strings of an old-fashioned hood under her chin, and setting about her through the aspe of their travelling cloak.

She smiled; blushed; a tear arose to her eye. She drew a miniature from her bosom, and kissed it.

"Is it—I?" said the white figure at Pauline's elbow. "It is I. It—I left my father's home one day for my lover's arms. Look!"

Over the glass one picture after another was passing in rapid succession. A stage coach, driven fast through a storm. An old man tearing his white hair as he sat beside a lonely hearth. Two lovers, her head upon his breast; one the fair first vision of his glass.

"They seem happy," murmured Pauline, "they at least seem happy."

"But, look!" whispered the white woman at her elbow. "There is no wedding ring upon her finger! And observe the picture! The lovers were gone. A woman watched at a window.

It was the beautiful girl again, but changed and saddened, pallid and worn. "She waits for him," moaned the vision at Pauline's side. "How long she waited, but he came not—he came not. He never came again. See!"

And Pauline looked, and saw the spectre of a great city; a figure in rags, begging, destitute, of those who passed her pitily. The snow fell; the wind futtered her wretched shawl. The spectre followed the pal—a constable with staff and lantern—approached, and laid a hand fell on her shoulder as he flung the light upon her face. Pauline saw the features that had been so lovely as the girl knotted the ribbons under her dimpled chin and kissed her lover's features.

"And now" sighed the phantom.

It was night again, and upon a city wharf one had lifted a harlot; they had drawn from the black waters—a dead woman. She lay stark and white, with her long wet hair in dark masses about her shoulders, and the full moon shone upon her face.

"It is the girl again," shrieked Pauline. "It is the same girl!"

Then, as in a magic lantern, when the glasses are moved rapidly away, two pictures passed—an old man standing over a younger one weltering in his blood, and a maniac howling behind the bars of his cell.

"My life!" moaned the white figure. "It was Adeline and Arthur sixty years ago. It is Pauline and Alfred now. But the story is the same. It began so; it may end so. I have warned you. Beware."

The vision was gone; the mirror, a mere flawed, dim sheet of blue glass, reflected nothing distinctly; and Pauline lay in a deep swoon upon the floor.

In the gray dawn she recovered her sense, and disorbing herself, crept back to her chamber—her sisters were yet in their cell, and nursed her tenderly; but later in the day Pauline, with her arms about her mother, asked her a question.

"Mamma," she said, "did you ever hear of a woman named Adeline? Did she anything to do with the old glass there?"

The mother was silent for a while; then she spoke gravely—

"That glass has always been called Miss Adeline's mirror. She was an aunt of your grandmother's—your father's uncle. A man in every way unsuitable to her who her heart. Her parents forbade him the house. She eloped with him. He never married her and left her soon; her after life was a wretched one, and she devoted herself it last. Her father, having learned the worst, shut her betrayer, and then went mad in a fearful story. That mirror is said to be the one she dressed herself at before she ran away; and it is said that she appears in it to any girl of the family who is tempted to do wrong. My child—why do you cling to me so?"

"I have seen her, mother," murmured Pauline. It was the only confession she ever made. Her mother needed no other.

And so, whether in a vision or a dream, or only by memory awakened in a guilty conscience from some tale listened to in childhood—she got what lesson she sought the girl who had but taken the first step towards destruction, and Pauline remained innocent and happy in her father's home.—M. K. Dallas

The Capuchins.

A reform of the Franciscan Order instituted by Matteo de Basti, of Urbino, who became in Conventuine Franciscan at Mount Falco, and having continued himself like the "capuche" or cowl worn by St. Francis was different in shape from that worn by the friars of his own time, adopted a long beard in accordance with the hermits supposed to be the original forms. In 1526 he obtained the consent of Pope Clement VII. to the wearing of this habit by himself and his companions, with the further permission to live the life of hermits, and preach the gospel in every country, on condition that once in each year they should present themselves at the general chapter, wherever it might be held, of the Observantine Friars.

The statutes of the Order were drawn up in 1529. The government was placed in the hands of a vicar-general, for they were at first subject to the general of the Conventuals, and only obtained exemption from the obedience in 1537. Matrea were to be not at midnight, and the other canonical hours at the time originally assigned to them; hours for mental prayer, for silence, and for taking disciplines, were prescribed. They were to have no revenue, but to live by begging; everything about their churches was to be poor and mean; the very chalices were to be of pewter, and in celebrations of the altars, gold, silver and silk were excluded. They might eat one kind of meat in rainy, and wine was allowed, but not flesh. They had forbidden dia himself more regionally he was not prevented. In their begging rounds two friars were not to ask sister for most eggs—a delicate dish, they might accept what was offered. On the most illustrious nomen in this Order is that of St. Fidelis of Sigmaringen, a soldier and powerful preacher, martyred by the Calvinists of the Grisons in 1622.

At the time Helpot wrote, near the beginning of the last century, the Order of Capuchins were divided into more than fifty provinces and three "vicariates," containing sixteen hundred converts and twenty-five hundred priests, besides missions in Brazil and various parts of Africa. In the French Revolution—through there were a few expelled—temporarily, no other order was illustrating the serene and stable virtues of the great majority of the Capuchins. In Belgium was annexed to France in 1797, and others were sent to Corsica and Sardinia at Louvain into the street, the guardian then expelled cries aye, "I resist in the night of Heaven that it is only force which makes us go out of our house; that I and my brethren remain Capuchins; that we are suffering for religion, and are ready, if need be, to be martyrs in its cause." A large number of their convents were suppressed during the revolutionary treatise; in France, however, they had recured again to a considerable extent, but the persecuting "Liberalism" which has for long time laid away there ejected them again (1880). They are at present most numerous in Austria and Switzerland also there are many, and also greater they are said still to number several thousands. There are at present seven Capuchin convents in England and Wales and three in Ireland.

In 1857 the Capuchins opened their first convent in America. Archbishop Henni received them in his diocese, where they built their first home upon the shore of Fond du Lac County, Wis. This was the cradle of the Order in the free soil of America, which, however, in a comparatively short time became the Mecca (Center) of the Order in the new world. Two annual fathers of the Order from Switzerland were the pioneers of the Capuchin Order. The little convent under went many changes; new additions were built, and it has now over forty priests of the Order within its walls. In 1875, Capuchins of the Bavarian province settled in Pittsburg, Pa. Two years later, in 1879, owing to the Kulturkampf in Prussia, two Capuchins of the Westphalia province landed in New York to seek a home for themselves and their brethren. They succeeded in building a convent in Peoria, Ill.—Church Progress.

Unjust Discrimination.

While the English Government has refused for the last two years to register the Catholic School, and was about to put into to and the Kalamazo Catholic School, it has within the last few months placed on the list of school schools, the Anglican Hope School at Holly, and the Wesleyan Girls School of the same place, another Protestant school in the Parish, Cobham, and one in Redhills. Thus while the Government hesitates favors to all the Protestant sects, it denies to Catholics who they have a just claim to. The popple attending Protestant schools are mostly Roman Catholics, the Government great to those schools is simply a subsidy for proselytizing purposes, whereas the pupils in Catholic schools are Catholics, and the money bounded out by the Government to give them a fair share is simply a bribe to Protestants. Again Catholics are to Protestants as 10 to 1 in the population, and, as they thus contribute a larger amount in the way of taxation, surely it is a small matter, if they receive the same consideration as others.

THE HAIL MARY.

As Jesus Christ did not wish to come into the world except through Mary; as after His Resurrection He did not wish to send Himself except with His Mother to the shepherds and Magi who were the first fruits of His mission; so also, as the Holy Fathers teach, He ordinarily enters into hearts only through Mary, and permits Himself to be spiritually found only through her. The plain signification of all this is that if we desire seriously to know Jesus Christ well and to follow him as good Christians and faithful servants; if we are really anxious to be Jesus Christ's disciples and to have Him dwelling in our hearts we must give our souls to the Virgin Mary, and to have Mary in our hearts, for she is the Mother of the knowledge of Jesus Christ, of holy hope and of fair love. (Eccles. xxiv 24.) Mary is certainly our Mediatrix with Her Son as He is our Mediator with his Father. This is the ladder of hope and salvation on which St. Bernard rejoiced all his confidence. Mary did truly say in the very words of divine Wisdom, "He that shall find me shall find life," that is, Jesus, "and shall have salvation from Him." (Prov. viii. 35)

Oh! how grand then is not the wisdom of the Rosary under this very consideration. In order to make us forget Christ's tears, true servants and friends of Jesus Christ, it omits nothing to stir up in our hearts the most true and tender devotion to Mary. It is for this very purpose that it makes us repeat so often the Angelic Salutation and that wonderful prayer that we and so fearfully recalls to our mind the incomparable grandeurs and privileges of the Mother of God. It is impossible for our hearts not to feel for the incomparable Mary the most tender sentiments, and to be filled with joy and love in reciting the Rosary. It is, in fact, it is with the purpose of making us grow more and more attached to Mary that the Rosary has given by preference from amongst the mysteries of our Lord's sufferings, passion, and triumphs of her Son proposed to our meditation those in which the Holy Virgin took a leading part, or which in a particular manner relates to her, and that it bids us to take part in her joys, to share her sorrows, and her sorrows, and to hope to be associated with her in glory, and hence it is also so usually experience in performing said devotion the most intense feelings of regret, love and desire!

With what tenderness, with what earnestness will not the Most Sacred Mother of God admit as amongst her cherished friends and favorite servants if we are in the habit of frequently salaring her with the Angelic Salutation, and what magnificent promises will we not make in loosing her Divine Son if we are assiduous in her! And as devotion to Jesus and Mary is especially bound up with the Rosary, it is evidently the most intense feelings of regret, love and desire!

A Colored Woman's Great Work.

NEW ORLEANS, May 21.—To-day we received the interment in the tomb of the Christian Brothers of Mrs. Josephine Delpuit, distinguished colored woman. Mrs. Delpuit died on the morning of the Ascension, Order of the Sisters of Charity, and Mrs. Josephine was the daughter of a German and Indian, and was born in Germany in this city 1836. She grew up a beautiful woman, and was a pupil of the Ursuline Institute of Christian Doctrine, with an earnest religious vocation, which her parents, who were Catholics allowed to people of her race and color, to enter in life she had delight in doing good, feeding the poor and teaching the catechism to the neglected colored children. She was widely attend the religious ceremonies at the Carondelet Convent. She was so happy when she could spend a day in the same spirit, and the three determined to begin carrying out their aims, a community undertaking for three weak women. Joseph Chambon, Mrs. Delpuit's first husband, thinked sowed to devote all they had of earthly money to establish an order for the instruction of the poor, and the relief of sick, poor and relief of poor, helpless old people, and the education of the orphans and slavery days. The first work undertaken by the little sisterhood, organized was the teaching of poor slave children, and the Sunday school, which was attended by thousands of the statute law, the famous black code, making their fathers a criminal, they accomplished a great deal. An orphan asylum was established on Chartres street, Mary Josephine died, she assumed the habit of the Sisters of Charity. Since the war the order, through Josephine Delpuit's management and excellent discipline, has been established on a substantial basis. The Sisters in 1880 established a mother house on Delaire, between Royal and Bourbon streets, to train the Catholics and the historic site of the old Orleans Theatre. Here pupils are received, taught, are received, and here a Christian education is given to poor colored girls. Mother Josephine died at eighty years of age, and the Sisters of Charity, Mrs. Delpuit's order, in the Sisters are included a branch of Spelman in 1875 she opened a home for aged and infirm colored people on St. Bernard, between Miro and Marais streets. On January 22 1878, she instituted an orphan asylum for colored children, and in 1880 a home for Hospital streets. She surmounted the order of Sisters of Charity, Mrs. Delpuit's order, and accomplished a great work of benevolence and charity. Her life was one of all the more wonderful and creditable when it is known that for a number of years her health had been failing, and that for the last six years she was almost blind. From her cradle she was accustomed to the direction of the affairs of the order. She died at the ripe old age of 75 years, and was buried with all the honor of a saint in the presence of thousands of earnest mourners.

OUR CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY.

Why Washington has been Chosen as its Site—What it will Attempt: How the Protestants will not Be Slighted.

The Northwestern Chronicle, which since the return of Bishop Ireland from Washington, has been its official and authentic source of information on the subject, supplies the following information concerning the new University:

"The Catholic University of America" this is the legal title of the new institution, nearly becoming an accomplished fact. By September, 1889, it is to be open to its first students. The meeting of the Board of Directors held in Baltimore, on the 7th of May, put the work in motion, and the appointment of the committee of efforts until the Catholics of the United States will one a centre of knowledge, sacred and profane, second to none other in the world. This is the authorized the men who have been chosen to put into execution the mandate of the late Plenary Council, and their plans and means indicate the institution which will be soon a reality.

Washington is to be the site of the University in which the University will be located. The ground has been purchased, consisting of sixty five acres. It is a beautiful site, miles north of the Capitol, at the head of the Capitol, directly opposite the main gate of the Soldier's Home, to the most elegant and beautiful part of the city. The ground is known as the Middleton estate. The price paid for it was $25,000. The buildings are to be of the Gothic style, to resume the long time the Directors could have made. Without the aid of the secular and social centre of the country; it is the purpose of the University to make it a centre of every school, a national metropolis, and the University will be open to the whole continent; there will it attract students from the ends of the earth and centuries in the whole nation. The University will be liberalized the only will be of numerous value of the Catholic University of America in Washington the Church, too, contributes to the Catholic University of the country. She proves herself acting in the Republic, assumes to lead in the public mind. Washington, the Catholic Church chosen as one to the very heart of America and Washington, while being thoroughly Catholic, they will be the Catholic University. The accusation is not likely ever again to be made in the country that the Church fears light and liberty, or dreads contact with progress.

THE SITUATION FOR THE THEOLOGICAL DEPARTMENT will be begun early next spring at a later date the departments of law, medicine, etc. will engage the attention of the Board. For the present the Board are busying themselves with what they deem of prime importance, the organization of the schools of education of the clergy. The plans of the Board in this direction are, we understand, are already well defined. There will be a preparatory school, which will represent philosophy, rhetoric, moral theology, canon law, sciences, and the ancient and modern languages. Students will be admitted to the University proper, and prepared for studies in ordinary theological seminaries as examination in a high standard. The University will be open to students of the seminaries of the country. The University will be free to the priests in all matters of the schools of the day. The University will also be free to the church will be tried and tested, which will be presented to the University, which will be presented to the University, which will be presented to the University

THE MONITOR.

WEEKLY NEWS-TRADE JOURNALISTIC.

WEDNESDAY JUNE 17, 1885.

MISSION OF THE CATHOLIC PRESS.

"Journalism is the greatest lever power, because it is the chief agent in popularizing ideas, and pages of and times circulation opinion, and opinion governs the world. In our view, religious journalism is not only a legitimate, but a necessary outgrowth of the age, and is, within the low sphere of secular, but a part of upon Church, which has ever been the advocate of Truth, what is and what might be the object of journalism, the Catholic journalist may well claim, if he pleases, to be, among all, the Divine truth." "Let the Catholic Press be what it should be, May God bless and advert its work, the intercessions of St. Francis de Sales, under whose protection they wish to be placed, the writers of Catholic journals be defend the cause of religion, be rights and those of the Holy Church, and the Catholic Press be a faithful and powerful ally of the Holy Ghost, and the spirit of Christ, and the spirit of Christ, and the spirit of Christ

Farm and Home.

THINGS THAT NEVER DIE.

The pure, the bright, the beautiful,
That inspired our hearts in youth,
The impulse of a worthless prayer,
The dream of love and truth,
The longing after something lost,
The spirit's yearning cry,
The stirring after better hopes—
These things shall never die.

The timid hand extended forth to aid
A brother in his need,
The kindly word to grief's dark hour,
That proves a friend indeed;
The plea for mercy, soft'ning firmness,
Be as oil upon the troubled sea;
The sorrowings of a contrite heart—
These things shall never die.

Let nothing pass, for every day
Must find some work to do;
Lose not a chance we may improve,
Be firm and just and true;
So shall a light that cannot fade
Beam on thee from on high,
And angel voices say to thee,
"Those things can never die."

Things Worth Remembering.

That a bag of hot sand relieves neuralgia.

That warm borax water will remove dandruff.

That salt should be eaten with nuts to aid digestion.

That milk which stands too long makes bitter butter.

That a hot, strong lemonade taken at bedtime will break up a bad cold.

That it rests you, in sewing, to change your position frequently.

That rusty irons should be rubbed over with beeswax and hard.

That a little soda water will relieve sick headache caused by indigestion.

That a cup of strong coffee will remove the odor of onions from the breath.

That tough meat is made tender by laying a few minutes in ginger water.

That well-ventilated bedrooms will prevent morning headaches and lassitude.

That a cup of hot water drank before meals will relieve nausea and dyspepsia.

That a lever patient can be made cool and comfortable by frequent sponging off with soda water.

That consumptive night sweats may be arrested by sponging the body slightly in salt water.

That one in a faint should be laid flat on his back, then loosen his clothes, and let him alone.

That cold tea should be saved for your cinnamon bread. It sours easily and gives color and flavor.

That to heat the whites of eggs quickly, add a pinch of salt. Salt cools, and cold eggs froth rapidly.

That the hair may be kept from falling out after illness by a frequent application to the scalp of sage tea.

That you can take out spots from waxin goods by rubbing them with the yolk of an egg before washing.

That white spots upon varnished furniture will disappear if you hold a hot plate from the stove over them.

That bread, when it is good for a rough complexion. Put a handful in a rag, dip it in tepid water, and then wash with it.

That teething children may be relieved of convulsions by being immersed in warm baths with cold cloths on their heads.

That you should breathe through your nose instead of your mouth, especially on coming from a warm room or hall, into the damp night air.

That pulverized camphor and lard, stirred to a salve, is excellent for sweep or cold, applied to the throat sheet or nose. After which cover with soft flannel.

That a mixture of rain water, cologne and glycerine, should be kept by those whose troubled with roughness of the skin. Apply to the face or hands after washing.

That narcrose headache, when the pain is frontal and the blood vessels are full and throbbing may be relieved by putting a few cloths on the head and hot water on the feet.

That milk-pans should be immersed some minutes in boiling water, as it has been demonstrated that, when not so treated, they breed a host of fungous germs which poison the milk.

That warm mustard water should be given to one who has accidentally swallowed poison. This will cause vomiting after which a cup of strong coffee should be given to counteract the remaining effects.

A Good Mother.

"One good mother is worth a hundred schoolmasters. In the home she is the loadstone to all hearts and loadstar to all eyes." Imitation of her is constant, imitation which blooms likens to a "globe of prospects." Its instruction is to teaching without words, often exemplifying more than tongue can teach. In fame of bad example, the best precepts are of but little avail. The example is followed, not the precepts. Indeed, precept at variance with practice is worse than useless, inasmuch as it only serves to teach that most cowardly of vices—hypocrisy.

Rat Riddance.

"Allow me," writes a correspondent "to suggest a simple means of getting rid of these pests. In the year 1875 I was in command of the British vessel Fairy Queen, plying along side this wharf at Melbourne, embarking Chinese passengers for Hong Kong. The wharfs were so infested with rats that it was impossible to prevent them getting on board, and my vessel was well stocked with them. After being at sea a few days, I mustered all the passengers—with their effects—on deck, to give them an airing, and for the purpose of giving the passenger deck a good cleansing, and sprinkling some chloride of lime mixed with water. I also had a couple of buckets of the same mixture poured down the pumps. This I continued weekly; when, to my surprise, the rats made a raid on the cabin (poop) on deck, and became so troublesome that neither myself nor my officers cared about turning in at night. A happy thought struck me—that the chloride of lime had driven them from below decks; so I had everything cleared out of the cabin and shore room, and freely used the mixture. This had the desired effect, the rats taking shelter in every available place outside. The rats on some good sport, especially on a moonlight night when all hands engaged in hauling rats and driving them overboard, so that by the time we arrived at Hong-kong not one was left on board. On my return to England, I took a house and furnished it. After being in it a short time, I found that it was infested with rats. They would get through every part of the ground floor. On examination, I discovered that drain ran under the house, emptying into the harbor. I have again used the chloride of lime freely; and in less than a week every rat had taken its departure. I have recommended this remedy to many ship masters and friends on shore; and in all cases it has proved a success. I have occupied my present residence for five years, and we have neither rat nor mouse on the premises. I attribute this to the free use of the above mixture, which is also effective as a deodorizer and disinfectant.

A New Way to Pay Old Debts.

Shakespeare tells a lie when he accuses Cleopatra of using immortal pearls; but debts to answer must be paid in mortal coin, and pearls can be obtained through the use of Dr. Pierce's "Golden Medical Discovery." It is a cure—all but invaluable for sore throat, bronchitis, pleurisy, consumption, and all diseases of the pulmonary and other organs, caused by scrofula or "bad blood." Scrofulous sores, swellings and tumors are cured by its wonderful alterative action. By druggists.

Family Fun.

Giving Her Census.

When the census-taker rapped at the door of a certain cottage on Butter street the other day, and wondered if the woman would set the dog on him or douse him with dish water, a great disappointment awaited him. She opened the door softly, smiled the sun to see if he smelled of lightning rods, and then threw it open for him to enter.

"Madam, I am making a census of the city," he began.

"Ah! sot down," she replied, and as he began opening his book she continued:

"There are five of us in the family, and we paid one hundred down on the place. My husband's name is Peter, he was forty-two, and he came from a mean family. His father was always having law-suits about dogs, and his mother was the great cur gossip in Elmira. Have you got that down?"

He nodded assent, and she continued.

"My name is Alvinah Sarah, and I was born in——"

"I do not care to know where you was born, madam," he interrupted.

"Well, I ears!" she exclaimed; "it makes a great difference whether I was born in Africa or Boston, and I want it put down. As I was saying, I was born in Boston in 1836. Put down that I oums of a good family."

"Madam, you don't understand; you—"

"Don't I understand that I oums of a good family! I'd like to know of a Boston family which earned their own wages longer than the Hogarews! Put down that my father was in the Revolutionary war."

"You have three children, madam?"

"I haven't any such thing, sir! Put down that my mother was killed by a piece of plaster in a gussey. Her father was——"

"How many children have you, madam?"

"Have you got mother down?"

"No, madam. You see I am taking the census of the city."

"Well," she said, giving him a dangerous look, "I had the typhoid fever, at the age of 10, and for weeks and weeks I hung on the edge of the grave. I hope up a sewell as I was able, and——"

"Have the family—how many children?" he suddenly asked.

"I put down that I bore up," she commanded. "And that one night when the waitress was asleep I crept out of bed and took a drink of——"

"This is foreign to the subject, madam. How old are your children?"

"Haven't you got down that I hung on the edge of the grave?"

"No, madam.

"Aren't you going to?"

"No, madam. You see, I am simply taking the census of the city. I desire to ascertain——"

"You see," ascertain it here, are she snapped. "If you get an anywhere put our pictures in that book, we'll make it hot for you! Good day, sir,—good day."

He stood on the step, sighing, and she slammed the door.

"My grandfather was also bitten to death by an alligator, but I won't stop to give you the particulars! You want to wait!"

He passed on, sorrowfully wondering if the next woman a mother was blown off a bridge or carried down the river on a haystack.

The Widower and the Widow.

When Mr. Thomas Thompson was courting the widow she became his sixth wife; and he, taking a perch of snuff and looking wise, "I will tell you what I expect of you, my dear. You are aware that I have had a good deal of matrimonial experience. Upon it it makes me and to think of it. My first wife was remarkable for her meekness; she never said a word when I was cross. My second was a perfect angel; my third was a perfect angel; my fourth was a perfect angel; my fifth was a perfect angel; my sixth was a perfect angel. I expect you will be a perfect angel."

"Why, my first husband frequently remarked" began the widow.

"My first husband frequently remarked!" began the widow.

"Stop!" said the widow, rising and shaking her fist in his face; "I'm not to be put upon in this way! I'm not to be compared with your first husband! I'm not to be compared with your second husband! ST. AGNES' ACADEMY, STOCKTON.

STOCKTON, Cal., June 12, 1885.

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR:

Dear Sir:—Weber Hall in this city was the scene of a very pleasing entertainment last Thursday evening, inaugurating the annual commencement exercises of St. Agnes' Academy. The yearly distribution of prizes and award of premium took place on that evening, and it will be long remembered by the parents and friends of the children as an occasion on which they had the happiness of seeing their pets, some of them having not home or graduating from school, to take up some future life of usefulness, while many others will yet remain under the careful instruction of the good Sisters of St. Agnes, there to receive what will be a lasting benefit to them in the future. At previous exercises of this kind it was the custom to have a few of the graduating pupils read the benefit of their living at a distance from the part of the day, but this year it was dispensed with and the exercises commenced precisely at o'clock in the evening. Long before that time the large hall was well filled with people eager to see how well the young ladies progressed during the past year at school. All through the audience was very attentive and at the close were unanimous in their praise of the well-trained and skilfully-arranged programme.

The Archbishop Purcell Litteratim.

Cincinnati, June 8.—The Criminal Court today decided the case of J. B. Meanis, assignee of Archbishop Purcell, against Bishop W. H. Elder and others, a suit to subject church property to the payment of the debts of the deceased bishop. The District Court, which first heard the case, held that Meanis was merely a creditor and that the church property so held by him in trust was not subject to the payment of his debts. But it was held that where any deficiency remains it should be made up by any particular church that property could be held for the purpose. The case was before the Supreme Court on a motion to vacate the judgment of the District Court. The motion was denied.

Terrible Catastrophe in France.

PARIS, June 11.—At Thiers, a town in the Department of Puy-de-Dome, a murder trial has been in progress for some days. Yesterday, the last day of the trial, the Court house was crowded with men and women anxious to witness the closing scenes. When the jury had left having, immediately after adjournment of the Court, and were jammed upon the stone staircase leading to the street, the lofty staircase fell. The cause which followed was appalling, the piteous moans of scarcely-born sufferers, groans of the dying, the shrieks of the wounded, while through their flesh and bones and mangling and mutilating them in a horrible manner. The fall of the staircase and screams of the people brought telephone in the cities, caused a panic in the Court-room, and there was a rush for the new crushed exit. Those who were in front were unable to withstand the pressure from behind, and were hurled down upon the men and women who were crushed in the fall of the staircase, and whom the people on the street were already striving to rescue. The people in the Court-room had exhausted itself, and he manfully assisted in the work of rescuing the unfortunate victims. Fifteen were taken from the ruins dead, two others died on the way to the hospital, and twenty-two

CHOOSING A BLAZON.

Why cause Leola to and fro?
What should she Kingly know?
Why swells with mingled grief and joy
His regal brown eye?

What sorrow mars his noble life,
And wrings his heart with pain,
What tears flow in his aching head,
What tidings o'er the main?

It is the thought of days gone by,
Of Vilfry's burning hope,
Of thirteen hundred glorious lives
Crushed in woe and pain.

Is it remorse that chills his soul,
And bows his lofty head,
Remembrance of his cruelty
And hours forever fled?

Oh! he has mourned that rash, fierce part
In pashaism and proper,
And now he plods his soul of faith
That redeemed he sought.

For hark! they Europe's length and breadth
Rings out: Edessa lies
Broke beneath the hoof of Moslem hordes,
And sacred Salem sries.

For help to faithful Christian hearts,
Wherever on earth they are,
And in the soul of Europe's King,
That cry has been a star.

Wooing him, like the Magian three,
From pagan, pompous pomp and pride,
From palace, domes and smiling realm,
Of dreary waste and blight.

To lay his offerings at Christ's feet,
And by his side to stand,
Fresh Paynim power the sacred soil
Of Christ's redemption land.

And at his bidding, lo! a host
A hundred thousand strong,
Thrilled by the fervent burning words,
Swift at his summons throng!

Their souls responding to the call,
"Hosts, Christian warriors all!
Fly! fly as lions! Gleaming behind the cross
And if it needs be fall

Beneath its inborun folds!
The red cross shining bright,
God with it in their battle cry
"St. Denys and the Right!"

For Clairvaux's holy abbot paints
In characters of fire,
Godfrey's, Bohemond's, Tancred's fame,
And dashes deeds of old.

"And he who gave his life for you
May well claim yours!" he cried,
"Go, follow in your father's steps,
And grasp their glittering prize."

Oh age of Faith! His eloquence saw
Their measures dost to kneel,
To bind the cross upon his breast,
And gird his shining steel.

But now Kline Louis walks apart
With thoughtful mien and brow,
Why lingers he in garden bowers
In such a time as now?

His banners flout, his bugles sound,
His vassals take their call;
Ah! Louis chooses, ere he goes,
A blazon for his shield.

Hence, cease he now the glowing eyes,
And then the lily's breast,
The modest violets blue and white,
The poppy's crimson nest.

Let but these hearts upon his sight
That "Eye of Heaven" so fair,—
Let but his lips, in fervent prayer,
Glanced thro' the balmy air,

Its mercy portrait like a spear,
Its inner hues of deep and bright,
Its bearded lily, like warriors' bold,
Its violets meek and mild,

Second like a mystic, heaven-sent pledge,
"Lily blazon thine, he said."
"Be thou" the monarch cried in joy,
"O pure and noble flower!"

And through the centuries that have passed,
And through the centuries that have passed,
And through the centuries that have passed,
Lo! the lily, the violet, the rose,
Are the blazon of France!

"Not unlike that will never wear,
On Duty's battle field!

What blossoms of our school day bower
Will be our "Flower de Luce"?
What watch-word of the past shall ring
Thro' all the years to be?

Earth's flowers are fair, but swift to fade,
Then let us higher aim,
And be our badge a lily of the crusade,
Heaven's Lilly.—Note Dame.

The sweetest song of Zion ever oped
Its petals to the light,
The brightest star that ever shone
Upon Time's tower of night.

The star, the flower whose light and bloom
Thy part have secured,
Star of the sea, and Bethlehem's Star!
Be a crescent our crib.

The basic blast of Duty breaks
Upon our souls to-day,
And from these calls, encountered zones,
We turn our steps for aye.

But e'ny we go, what thanks are yours
Dear Teachers of our youth!
Farewell! may God your guerdon be,
Every pleasure of truth.

Then hand, we follow in Faith's goal,
Our path is sun,—God's will,
Thro' storm and shine, to Heaven,
Be thou our Hesse still.

The Cousins.

CHAPTER I.

About twenty two years ago, Mr. Sagan, a well-to-do farmer, residing within a few miles of one of the most populous cities of New England, received a letter from "Down South," as the boys term it. This letter he read to his children at their evening meal. It was as follows:

"Dear Hector—Ere this reaches you, you will have heard of the severe domestic afflictions with which I have been visited. I solicited Father R. to write to you on the day in which he read the funeral service over my husband and my two daughters. They lie together in one grave in Headstone Cemetery. For some time after I myself was ill; and my little boy—my affectionate living child—also took the fever. We are now convalescent, though, as you will readily believe, not yet strong. The physicians have ordered change of air and a cooler climate for both. As regards myself, I am compelled to go to Europe on some business of importance. I would willingly take my boy, my Augustus, with me, but my business requires all my attention, and he could not from me receive the attention necessary to his health and education. It struck me, then, that perhaps you would receive my darling among yours for a time. I hear that my sister Emma has been living with you since you, too, lost your poor wife. Death. I think Emma still retains a tender nose for her brother Joseph, and would cherish his orphaned child as fondly as she does yours. Augustus is a good child, though he has been somewhat petted. Of course, I should willingly pay for whatever expenses he may incur. I will send him an attendant to wait upon him if you consent—unfortunately, he is little accustomed to wait upon himself. These evil times of late, and say that you consent to this arrangement in favor of the child of your affectionate brother.

JOSEPH SAGAN."

There was a deep silence for some time after this letter was read.

"Well, children," at length said Mr. Sagan, "shall we send for Augustus to live with us?"

"If it is as proud as a peacock," said Thomas.

"And as idle as—I don't know what," said Mamie.

"Why, how do you know, never having seen him!

Aunt Emma told us when she came back last year, Mrs. Sagan used to lie on a sofa nearly all day, and have a little girl to fan the flies away; and the children used to have some one to wait upon them all the time. Augustus would not fetch his own hat, or handkerchief, or anything, and he kicked and screamed when he did not get what he wanted the very minute that he wanted it! Did you not say so, Aunt Emma?"

Aunt Emma looked sorry and foolish, then she said:

"I remember a older now, and Mrs. Sagan was probably sick."

"You don't know my whom you come back aunty; you said she was so idle, fine lady, fit for nothing, and that you were very glad we could have our old way at home. Mamie, you said that we learnt ten of each lazy families down South!"

Mr. Sagan looked displeased.

"See what mischief a few thoughtless words have done, he said. "I wrote to the children prejudiced against their cousin before you saw him! I thought better of you, Emma."

"I was very foolish, Mr. Aunt Emma, cause for our neighbors' faults, while we found our own, that we might be half the evil spared that now desolates the world—gossip, gossip, and for the most part ill-natured gossip, too, is the very pest of good morals.

Aunt Emma did not reply, she was thinking of how she could remedy the mischief she had done. The children, meanwhile, Mr. Sagan was a plain, blunt man, the sentiment and of firm Christian character; they never dared reply when he put down the law for them.

"Well," resumed he, after a pause, "concluding seems certain—we cannot consistently refuse to receive this child, and I shall write to my brother to that effect; and mind, one and all of you, he is to be treated kindly, not laughed at, or insulted."

"And if he laughs at our ways, and takes care of him?" asked the irrepressible Elwin, scarcely able to keep his countenance, through he made violent efforts to do so.

"No, I dispute that office to you while he remains with us," said Mr. Sagan, after which he pacified by the latter and went into the next room to answer it.

"To me! I turn nigger to Master Augustine! I think I see myself at it, so I do!" said Elwin, as he too left the room.

Aunt Emma began to weep. She was a warm-hearted young woman, though somewhat too free in expressing her opinions. Thomas and Mamie, who loved her deeply, could not bear to see her unhappy; they comforted her all they could.

"If you really love me," she said, in reply to their caresses, "you will be very kind to your cousin when he comes."

"We will, aunt Emma, indeed we will," replied they.

Some few weeks after this a handsome carriage drove up before the door of the old farm-house. A gentleman and a little boy about ten years of age alighted; they were both dressed in the deepest mourning. The gentleman bore and cases were taken out of the vehicle by a black servant, whom Mr. Joseph Sagan addressed as Pompey.

"Pompey is come—black Pompey—oh, what fun!" shouted Edwin. "He is so from Master Augustus, like his nose for him, sooth his hair, cut his victuals, and feed him with a spoon—the great spoonie! Fancy a boy of ten wanting a nigger to wait upon him! I suppose he'll carry him in his arms up those steps, poor pet!"

"Hush! Eddy hush, you'll make papa so angry," said Mamie.

Papa did not hear, or rather he heard whom it affected as deeply as it could effect; the was Augustus himself. He grasped his father's hand as he walked up the steps, and as soon as they entered the house, clung to him almost in agony, and as soon as he could find words he said:

"Papa, dear papa, you are not going to leave me here?"

"My child, my dear child," said his father, "see, this is your uncle, Uncle Sagan, cousins, you will love them, they will love you."

"No, they won't; no, they don't; they make game of me, I hear! Oh, papa, papa, don't leave me here! I shall die, indeed I shall die!"

"I hope so," said his uncle very kindly. "I hope not. Meantime, take off your trappers, and stay at home quietly, and don't been waiting some time."

They proceeded to justifying the boy satisfactorily for this operation. He soon recognized Aunt Emma, and thus became some what less estranged; but the children he looked at with eyes of sordon hatlike, which made Elwin wince, he he guessed that he must have been never heard. Mamie, too, looked a little contentious, for she feared that such might be the case; but all the rest were quite unaware of the occurrence, and they saw in the behavior of Augustus only the waywardness of an over-indulged child.

For two days his father remained at the farm, and Thomas and Mamie did their best to obliterate the painful impressions which Augustus had received. As for Elwin, he kept out of sight: he had discovered that black Pompey was not going to remain, and the idea that when he was gone, his father would require him to play servant to his cousin, took possession of him, and raised the spirit of rebellion strongly within him.

"I'm as good as he, if not better," he said, "and I'll be no nigger to no Master Augustus! Not I!"

When the time of departure came, Mr. Joseph Sagan, he was reminded to face difficulties, took the worst possible way of meeting them. He sent away and did not come back—he sent a man with a note to excuse himself—he could not go through the pain of saying adieu, so he was gone. Black Pompey was gone, too, for Mr. Sagan did not like to retain him. Augustus threw himself on the green sward and cried himself into a fit.

THE MONITOR.

WEEKLY REGISTER OF CATHOLICITY.

The MONITOR has the largest circulation of any Religious Paper published on the Pacific Coast.

WEDNESDAY JUNE 24, 1885.

MISSION OF THE CATHOLIC PRESS.

"Journalism is the greatest social power, because it is the chief agent in propagating issues, and projecting ideas sometimes opinion, and opinion governs the world. The Catholic Journalist, therefore, has a useful and serious mission, and may be a work indispensable to the welfare of society, but a sort of apostolate. What is and what ought to be the object of Catholic Journalism but to combat error and defend the truth, to propagate the Gospel and defend the Church?—Archbishop Kenrick's Address.

May God bless and direct throughout the destinies of St. Francis as mine, under whose protection they are placed, the interests of religion, the welfare and success of the Holy Apostolic See, and others in the direction and principle with devotion and fidelity.—PIUS IX

Editorial Notes.

—We had a visit last week from Rev. Hartleib, of Boise City, Idaho, and we were glad to learn from him that Bishop Gilrooy had arrived safely in his Vicariate, and was maturing his plans for procuring more priests, establishing schools, and opening new missions in that extensive region.

—The spirit of antagonism against the Catholic church which prevails among the infidel political rulers of France, was well demonstrated on the 19th inst, when the Chamber of Deputies, by a vote of 206 to 130, refused to exempt priests from serving in the army reserve.

—A recent dispatch says that Rev. Mr. O'Connell, Secretary to Archbishop Gibbons of Baltimore, has been appointed rector of the American College at Rome, but somebody has evidently blundered, as the secretary in question is Rev. Alfred A. Curtis, and there is no priest of the name of O'Connell in the Archdiocese of Baltimore.

—Nothing more silly ever appeared in the secular press than the cablegram concerning Cardinal Pitra which we published yesterday. The whole story was manufactured in the malignant mind of some Prussian or Italian Freemason who desired to stab the character of the Vicar of Christ by using Cardinal Pitra's name as being allied to a diabolical mass with which no Christian—much less a Cardinal—would compromise his character.

—A Sunday paper credits the Methodist Christian Advocate with saying: "The pastor who can help to put more money into quality into a home may thereby change the life of every member of the family." Would not a copy of this preacher's Mentor "help to put reading of a better quality" into many a Methodist home, and also open the eyes of Wesleyans to the wicked ways of some of their wolves in sheep's clothing!

—Pope Leo's Encyclical against Masonry seems to so have worried the leading spirits of that Satanic society that they are taking their revenge by publishing in all the prominent journals throughout the world the most slanderous and false version of the Encyclical. Why doubtful, indeed, at the times in the last twenty years, but whenever the Masons get mad at the Sovereign Pontiff for proclaiming their iniquities to mankind, they immediately refurbish this rusty falsehood and fling it out in the face of the world as fresh as if it had never been met with flat denial from the highest authorities in the Catholic Church.

—The reckless disregard for truth which at all times characterizes the utterances of the Argonaut in all matters appertaining to the Catholic Church or Catholic citizens, was never better illustrated than in the last issue of that disreputable sheet, when it asserted that "the Mormon population of Utah is made up of natives of Catholic countries." This is so palpably untrue that we doubt if there is another paper in America that would stretch its columns with such a bare-faced falsehood. As a matter of fact it is extremely doubtful if there is a score of natives of Catholic countries in the Mormon abomination. The inference of this newest phase of Protestantism, are naturally natives of purely Protestant countries like England, Wales, Norway, Sweden, Denmark and Switzerland, with a sprinkling of Americans, Negroes, and Indians following secret Henry VIII. There never was but one case known of an individual, known as a Catholic, who joined the many-wived Mormons, and he joined the nasty organization in order to make money out of it. As soon as this was accomplished he left the lascivious crowd and returned to respectability.

Monsignor Capel's First Lecture.

Every Catholic in San Francisco who intends to attend the lecture which Monsignor Capel will deliver on to-morrow (Thursday) night, at Metropolitan Temple, should try and coax some non-Catholic friend to accompany him.

In these days of agnosticism and infidelity, when skepticism in God's existence is so common, it is a real act of mercy to open the minds of men outside the Catholic Church to the fact that proof of God's existence can be discovered even by the light of human reason. The Vatican Council declared that reason could thus demonstrate the existence of God, and Monsignor Capel undertakes to make this important fact clearly comprehensible to all his hearers.

The old methods of argument about the doctrines of the Catholic Church have become obsolete, and the modern style of attack is an organized denial of Christ's Divinity, hence it is well—not only for Catholics, but for all denominations of Christians—to be able to meet the new believers of every community with accurate, intelligent and irrefutable arguments by which to overthrow the specious speculations of those "fools" who not only say in their hearts "there is no God," but who constantly proclaim their folly before their fellow-men.

We hope, therefore, that a crowded audience will greet Monsignor Capel on to-morrow night, as those who listen to him will hear the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

Malignant Methodist Malice towards the Mother of God.

Hatred of the Blessed Virgin seems to be the first commandment in the diabolical theology of the Methodist sect. The saints of the Church of God are accepted by Methodist preachers as "the elect" among men; pious people—they candidly admit—may exist occasionally in the "Romish" fold; but when a Catholic attempts to say a single "Hail Mary," or to perform any other devotional exercise to the Mother of God, then the Methodist parsons put on their war paint, they unbleach the wear cry of "Popish Idolatry" upon their banners, and they invoke all the legions of Belshazzar's Belshazzar to shake their sacrilegious and the fearful invocation which "Mariolatry" is making into what they call modern Christianity!

We had a slight taste of this Methodist hatred of the Mother of God through the columns of the California Christian Advocate a few weeks ago when that paper undertook the unholy work of lecturing Catholics upon the "blasphemy" which they uttered whenever they invoked the Blessed Virgin in prayer, and the "idolatry" which we practiced whenever we asked the Mother of God to intercede for us so that our prayers and good works might be acceptable to "Our Father who art in heaven."

The California Christian Advocate, and the whirligig Wesleyan weather-cock who works up the anti Catholic agency for its columns, are not strangers to the readers of the MONITOR. Upon at least a dozen different occasions we had to publicly rebuke the ignorant assumptions of concerning Catholic faith and morals, and yet this incorrigible and incomprehensible fanatic continues impenitent, just as if the transgression of the Golden Rule—"do unto others as you would be done by"—were a meritorious work in the moral theology of Methodism.

Brother McCrery
Who hates the "Hall Mary,"

Last month being specially devoted to the Blessed Mother of God, the MONITOR issued its customary small supplement containing authentic prayers to the Blessed Virgin, and this innocent little chapter of devotions to the ever Immaculate Queen of Heaven seems to have raised "Old Nick" in the soul of our Methodist brother, and to poison him with a very anti-Christian and even unnatural hatred of the Blessed Virgin.

Commenting on the MONITOR's supplement, the deluded Doctor whose slander is thus aroused by what he ignorantly calls "idolatry," makes a Methodist "mugwump" of himself by the following very foolish and nonsensical declaration:

"It is not necessary to comment on these idolatrous prayers. God has said: "Thou shalt have no other gods before me." If the mother of Jesus is not made an idol by this worship, then we cannot see how it is possible to violate the first Commandment. If the hours are idolatrous, there is not a single act of worship in them. There is not a syllable of such worship in them. Word. It is sickening and disgusting to see the Holy Name and the Holy Bible thus perverted into revolting breach of God's command."

What sensitivity! What polemical prowess! What slander that Pope Pius IX., was a Protestant, when he declared, only a few times in the last twenty years, but whenever the Masons get mad at the Sovereign Pontiff for proclaiming their iniquities to mankind, they immediately refurbish this rusty falsehood and fling it out in the face of the world as fresh as if it had never been met with flat denial from the highest authorities in the Catholic Church.

Brother McCrery's paragraphs are wonderfully "idolatrous" prayers as beneath his notice, and then he dissects them, demonstrates them, and weeps a whole washbasin full of Wesleyan water over "this revolting breach of God's command."

Now be it known to our mistaken, deluded and disgruntled Methodist brother, that the prayers in question do not contain a single syllable that can be tortured into "idolatry" even by the most rabid Methodist parson that ever devoured a yellow-legged chicken in Spring time! Neither Christian justice ought to have suggested a star sectarian slanderer of these Catholic prayers that if there was any "idolatry" in them, he should have pointed out, so that the world might give him credit for theological acumen, but the fact is knows in his heart and soul that he has calumniated his Catholic neighbors by his vile and vicious charge, yet he is too good a Methodist preacher to retract a single syllable of his slanderous assertion. There is not enough infernal ingenuity in a whole meeting-house full of Methodist preachers to torture a single phrase in the prayers in question into "idolatry," nor could all the canting parsons in creation connect a single "brace" of God's command," in any sense of these prayers, not even if they had Satan and his satellites trained as "special counsel" for the occasion.

Who hates the "Hall Mary,"

We know it is the authority of the Fathers and Saints of the Church that even at this very mention of the name of Mary the Mother of God, the very demons tremble, and hence we do not wonder that fell "as indescribable horror in reading those awful prayers." As he had them in his hand he doubtless felt the cold shivers creep down his evangelical spine; he felt further pulling at his legs while Satan was tugging at his coat collar; the imps of iniquity who so long held undisputed possession of the Advocate office were scattered in all directions; Wesley's portrait turned itself face to the wall; and even Brother McCrery's hat "took unto itself wings" and made a Wesleyan flip-flap through the window!

Brother McCrery
Who hates the "Hall Mary,"

Under such supernatural surroundings as these it is no wonder that our Wesleyan brother fell "as indescribable sense of horror," as the MONITOR's prayers to the Mother of God acted like an electric shock in purifying the sin-laden atmosphere of Brother McCrery's sanctum!

Our doleful dispenser of the Methodist gospel on the hall shelf, next proceeds to inform his ignorant world concerning his estimation in which he holds the ever-blessed Mother of God, which he does after this half-hearted fashion which fanatics are fond of indulging in:

"We respect the Virgin Mary and Mary the mother of Jesus, but to pray to her and pay divine honors to her, is so great and so fearful a blasphemy that we scarce dare to repeat the so-called prayers."

Dear brother! Please do not repeat "this so-called prayers," as they might shake you, and, in our Catholic charity, we have no desire to see even an miserable a sinner as a Methodist editor upset with that most awful of all earthly calamities: a sudden and unprepared death!

And so Brother McCrery,
Who hates the "Hall Mary,"

does not like to pray to the Blessed Virgin! He is evidently one of those "mixed" Methodist Christians who claim to love the Son of God but who hate His heavenly Mother! Such anomalous creatures would be scorned in the natural order, but it must be borne steadily in mind that in religious vagaries all things are possible to a Methodist preacher! Such false guides of the gospel

Conquered for sins they are inclined to,
By flattering them—they have no mind to.

hence the Protestant world has come to look upon Protestant preachers in general, and each Methodist preacher in particular, as a sort of supernatural biblical barnacle which has attached itself to Christianity, and which is merely tolerated in the present with the hope that the Devil will die out when the spirit of "religion a purpose" becomes sufficiently strong to shake off the screech-owl brood. The non-Catholic world reks very justly: "What are Protestant preachers good for, say how?" They cannot cipher out a single text of Scripture to suit even the smallest child in the Sunday school; they have no commission to teach—they have never to preach. They are merely preaching privateers who usurp an authority they have no God-given guarantee for; and, as such, they are merely useless flotsam and jetsam cast into the sea of sectarianism from out the ship of Jehovah—the bark of St. Peter!

With this brief digression let us return to our subject and ascertain what manner of super-constant creature is that Mother of God to whom this stiff-necked sectarian preacher not only refuses to pray himself, but who goes so far as to condemn as "blasphemous" and "idolatrous" the 200,000,000 Catholics who venerate the Mother of God.

The coming, the exalted power, the heavenly mission, and the glory of Mary the Mother of God, were all foretold by the Prophets of the Old Law—as verified by the Bible. She is the one whom Almighty God destined from the beginning to be the Mother of the Word made flesh! Out of millions upon millions of virtuous maidens who peopled the earth, Mary alone was found of sufficient purity of soul and body to become the Mother of our Blessed Redeemer!

Mary thus became the most beloved Daughter of the Eternal Father, the most cherished Mother of the Eternal Son, the immaculate and virginal Spouse of the Eternal Spirit. She stands supreme above her whole race, and to dethrone her from her exalted position the assault must be made upon her Divine Son. They have been joined together by Almighty God (Himself) and was be to the wretched Wesleyan sinner who dares to sunder the Eternal Son of the Eternal Father from His immaculate Mother!

Mary is the model of every virtue possessed by every Christian maiden, wife and mother throughout the whole Christian world during the past nineteen centuries! The magnetic power of her blessed example in the grace of final perseverance, and prayer for Heaven that purity of soul—in their final hours upon earth—without which none can enter that heavenly realm where the Mother and her Divine Son reign as Queen!

Mary was the most honored among God's creatures in having an angel sent as a special envoy of the most High God to salute her with this sublime tribute to her transcendent sanctity and virtue: "Hail full of grace, the Lord is with thee; Blessed art thou amongst women."

Here, let us ask that incorrigible Pharisee,

Brother McCrery
Who hates the "Hall Mary,"

if the Angel Gabriel committed "blasphemy" or "idolatry" when he saluted the Blessed Virgin by these divinely-inspired titles in her humble home at Nazareth! And if the Angel Gabriel was guiltless, will the representative of Methodist hatred of Mary tell us by what stretch of imagination he can fix the sin of "blasphemy" or "idolatry" upon Catholics when we use precisely the same language as that uttered by the Angel Gabriel in addressing our petitions to her!

Mary is "the handmaid of the Lord" even "all generations shall call blessed." She is the star of heavenly sanctity, the Mother with whom the Son of God dwelt for thirty years, honoring and respecting her with that intensity of filial love which an infinite God alone could demonstrate!

Mary it was who stood by the Cross on Calvary, whose heart was rent in twain as she saw her only beloved Son expiring in agony upon the Cross. And what was the last thoughts that agitated the mind of that heavenly victim of men's vice as He was dying on Calvary? It was to leave to the whole Christian world this same Mary the Mother of the Divine Son, as the Mother of the whole human race! "Son, behold thy Mother!" said our Blessed Redeemer to His expiring lips, and—praise be to God!—there was no Methodist preacher present at the Crucifixion to curl up his Calvinistic lip in scorn at the beautiful and beneficent legacy which our Blessed Redeemer left to mankind!

Such is the exalted dignity—the Divine elevation—which has been accorded to that heavenly chosen Mother of God to whom this Pacific coast Pharisee refuses to pray!

What must real Christian people think of that species of sham Christianity, represented by someone, which arrogates to itself the right to besmirch the Immaculate character of the Mother of God! Has it come to pass that even sham Christianity has fallen so low in this nineteenth century, that a Methodist assistant can pose himself as a "preacher" of the gospel of Christ, and yet call the Mother of our Blessed Redeemer to the Mother of God?

Has the Bible lost its force with Protestant preachers? Is there no longer a fall in the texts of scripture even by those who are called "Reverend," and who are paid fat salaries for preaching gilt-gospel sermons on Sundays? If

Who hates the "Hall Mary,"

is a fair sample of the Methodist preachers of our day, we must certainly deplore the decay that has overwhelmed Protestantism in its nineteenth century decadence, when the literary light of Methodism in this State can print those lines in his paper:

"Pray Protestant Christians these prayers and sound strongly, tut, tut, and shake your heads roundly, pray to any other woman or to Mary."

Degraded, indeed, must be the mind even of a Methodist preacher who could print such a scandalous paragraph in our State! The world knows too well already that there are many Protestant preachers whose penchant for "praying to other women" has brought disgrace upon Christianity and disaster upon society, but it remained for to boast of this immoral leniency of the age in the columns of a professedly religious paper!

Who hates the "Hall Mary,"

If there is any ingratitude to filial thicker in intensity or greater in degree, then that which covers with contempt the name and fame of His ever-blessed Mother, we know not where to find it. And in this hatred of the Blessed Virgin which surrices like the editor of the Christian Advocate seem to glory, we see the first plainest marks of the falsity of Methodism as a religion. No sect can pass God by—at least none which claims to be Christian—and yet, with impunity, let the super-exalted character of Heavenly Virgin Mother. Such defamation of the divinely-appointed Mother of God may please Methodists who are shallow-minded enough to hate Mary because the Catholic Church venerates her, but the Devil laughs at all such so-called "Christians," and the traps of hell glory in claiming the friendship of all such falsifiers of truth.

To love God we must of necessity love His Mother, the most perfect, pure and exalted creature that could be formed by the Omnipotent hand of God and the Holy Ghost to be the Mother of our Redeemer! And when we Catholics pray to her, we do so in full confidence that her influence with her Divine Son is Heaven is as great as it was when He was subject to her on earth. We pay no divine homage to any creature that wonderfully being reserved for God alone. We utter no "blasphemy" when we ask the Blessed Virgin and the Saints to pray for us, as the Sacred Word of God justifies such intercession. We are guilty of no "idolatry" in calling upon the Mother of God to help us in our feeble efforts to become worthy children of Christ. Methodist ignorance may insult Catholics by hurling at us charges of "blasphemy" and "idolatry," but when we consider that such calumnies come from the foul source that festers in the intensity of its hatred of the Mother of God, we simply accept the insult for the sake of that beloved Mother Dolorosa who suffered so much for us.

And, when such scandal-spiring sectarian scribes as attempts to belittle the character of the Blessed Virgin, they should bear in mind that they stand alone in their ignominy—immeasurably alone—and that the Angels of God glorify Mary! The legions of Saints love the Mother of God; love for His Immaculate Mother. The millions of good, holy, virtuous men and women who have passed away in the past eighteen centuries all bless, venerated and prayed to Mary Queen of Heaven! And for untold ages to come—long after the bigoted calumniators of the Mother of Christ have been buried and forgotten—the name of Mary will be recited and sung by millions of her children in the language of every clime in the world!

Brother McCrery,
Who hates the "Hall Mary,"

We have and that all the hosts of heaven love and honor this ever-blessed Mother of God. We have and that all the best men and women the world ever produced prayed to her, and now let us remind this rusting, Mary-hating Methodist preacher, that even Protestant popes have paid tribute of love and veneration to the Mother of God in such filial language as should bring the blush of shame to any sectarian whose brutal instincts would lead him to attempt to belittle the sacred character of the Blessed Virgin.

Did Brother McCrery,
Who hates the "Hall Mary,"

ever hear of that Protestant pope, John Kethe? If not, it may give our Methodist brother pain to read the following paragraph of horror" to read these lines addressed to the Blessed Virgin from that non Catholic source:

"Ave Maria! thou whose name
All Adam's offspring put to shame!
Yet may we learn thy virtues
For Heaven, thy Son and Saviour,
To crown all lowly lofty be thee.
Ave Maria, Ave Maria!"

Many other Protestant popes have been inspired to atone their sins to Mary's memory, and thus to "crown all lowly lofty be thee" in the language of John Kethe.

Many other Protestant popes have been inspired to atone their sins to Mary's memory, and thus to "crown all lowly lofty be thee" in the language of John Kethe.

Mary other it was who stood by the Cross on Calvary, whose heart was rent in twain as she saw her only beloved Son expiring in agony upon the Cross. And what was the last thoughts that agitated the mind of that heavenly victim of men's vice as He was dying on Calvary? It was to leave to the whole Christian world this same Mary the Mother of the Divine Son, as the Mother of the whole human race! The Boor and the Gentleman.

Years of journalistic experience has thoroughly convinced us of the unprincipled and unscrupulous character of the Anonymous Scribe who contributes to the Tribune, and we seldom pay attention to the lies of that blotter of all good taste. But inasmuch as the anonymous libeller has made a reference to one occasion, in his last issue, to attack the character of individuals who are—in point of intelligence and respectability—as far above him as the Pacific is above Alaska, we propose to lay before our readers some facts which will go far to prove that Sanford Frank has not yet forgotten the first lesson he learned from the father of Lies.

The malignant spleen of the Argonaut was poured out last week upon the character of Judge Gaskill, and the Tribune, of Tribune, because that gentleman had the temerity to speak of Monsignor Capel, in his paper, as a man of brains and cultivated taste, and as a gentleman. The Tribune's offending are contained in the following words, continuously spoiled in the Argonaut, from the lecture of Monsignor Capel, published in the Tribune:

"Compact, well built, sturdy," "splendid physique," "a man of brains," "a man of cultivated taste," "over a heavy body a shapely head is poised, and there is no doubt of it, a man of intellectual and perhaps even of moral force, and there is no doubt of it, and there is no doubt of it, a man of "severe logic," "profound learning," and "eloquent."

Now, if the Tribune had used these words in reference to Rev. Bishop Kip, Bob Ingersoll or Senator Stanford, the Argonaut would have re-echoed the praise of praise, "from Siskiyou to San Diego, from the Sierras to the sea." It would say to a Roman Catholic—even one of the Pope's Irish—and possess the attributes recorded in Mons. Capel by the Tribune and it does not follow that become a gentleman renders honor to whose honor is due—regardless of either political or religious differences of opinion, that he is necessarily a toady or a time-server.

Judge Gaskill is known throughout the Pacific States, Utah and Nevada, and the Territory of Utah, as an honorable and talented gentleman, a man of the most high and honorable character, who stands in his local life then ten thousand such political parasites as Pixley could perform in a lifetime, and who, if he had a public position, would do his duty fearlessly and impartially.

Personally many of the elements of true Christianity, and pure the teachings of our Blessed Saviour into practice, while his political associates are endeavoring out false bonds against his fellow-man.

Is there living on the Pacific Coast to-day a more honest, more upright, more kindness, unselfishness or charity on the part of this literary assassin? There are him goodness—as truly to Judge Gaskill as Christ's goodness—and Judge Gaskill has dared to praise a Catholic prelate who—first in world, and, and whose ancestry is unsurpassed in the world—is to feel the force of the lungs of Sanford Frank.

The true theory of this Republican literature is that it is exercise free speech, free thought, and a free press. Now, we would say, which is the better American—Judge Gaskill, who recognizes the merit of theological foe, and is willing to give him every chance to be heard, or that contemptible crank who—in blind bigotry and obstinate ignorance—condemns the apostle unheard because he is prejudiced against his creed? We answer that the true American is not a bigot, either as regards race, religion or politics. The non-American is the nature born citizen who would tabooed those who differ with him in politics or religion, who may not have achieved the accident of birth on American soil, but who is, nevertheless, dangerous to the perpetuity of the Republic than any other element of discord could possibly be, because he would be ever ready to stab in the back in the house of its friends.

We shall not enter into any controversy in reply to the inane ravings of the Argonaut as regards Mgr. Capel, that gentleman is perfectly able to take care of himself, but if it be true that a blunt child dreads the fire, fanatical French will overcome that disposition which is the better part of valor, and not attempt to measure swords with the Monsignor. His fatal bolt will fire. Will Sam Clemens lies not yet failed from the pistol mind? that little pocket-pistol of his was exploding, so which Mr. Twiley was not first, shinning and begging for mercy, and—if we may be permitted the expression—squealing like a stuck pig. He got good his depth then, he will be drowned sure if in attacking so great a theologian, philosopher and orator as Mgr. Capel, he the fool, steps in where angels fear to tread. We have no idea, however, that our distinguished and eminent writer will condescend to descend to such a low plane of controversy by engaging in a controversy with him. He will very probably dashing him as Archbishop Gibbons did Charles Bonaparte, the famous controversy between those gentlemen. After having completely demolished Bonaparte's boasted "science, fact and dragoons," the Archbishop closed the controversy with the remark that when he found a lower or easy lounging on his window sill, he put on his gloves, gently took the insect between his thumb and forefinger and liberated him in the outer air.

Referring to the Tribune's article on Mgr. Capel, the Argonaut says

"These comments are suggested because we hate to have such men as Monsignor Capel injure Americans with the impression that the journals are usually sycophantic, or the editors toadies."

The Morton is, equally with the Argonaut, would hate to have Mgr. Capel leave America with such an impression as above indicated, and we fear that if the Monsignor loses any valuable time on reading the Argonaut during his stay, and has the misfortune to have Frank's prominent produces thrust itself upon him, after the owner a usual manner of forcing introductions to distinguished or worthy visitors, he cannot fail to leave Bartomarky with the impression that, if the Argonaut is a representative American newspaper and its editor a representative American writer, he will most assuredly be forced to the conclusion that "Sycophancy is the common property of phasis" and their editors "toad-eating flunkies." As to fanatical French's severity, flunkeyism and toadyism, there is but one opinion in this community, and, like all lick-spittles—he is despised and contemned even by those whose boots he licks.

It has been one of Pixley's boasts that he did not condescend to native interior journals. It sure better for him he adhered to this rule; for he knowing Judge Gaskill he will find himself in the same fix as the boy who thought a hornet's nest was "such a pretty plaything," and whose curiosity led him into the hornet's nest with a stick.

Topics of the Times.

—Arthur J. Balfour, M. P., nephew of the Marquis of Salisbury, has been appointed Secretary for Scotland, and Mr. Mundella, Secretary for Ireland and Mr. Morley, Secretary for Scotland. We sincerely hope that a change of officials will bring a change for the better in Irish affairs, for the Irish Bill of Rights has been a scandal and a disgrace to the nation that boasts so much of its Christian civilization.

—We had a couple of very interesting interviews with Monsignor Capel last week, during which we learned many interesting facts connected with his life and labors in the Catholic vineyard, and we hope to see the issue of editorial work which other matters have crowded upon us this week we could insert some of the particulars, but, hence we must postpone the article until next week.

—The power of "boycotting" was singularly illustrated in Ireland a few weeks ago, when the students of St. Malachi's College assembled close to Dunlewey, declared that the college stole a pupil whose father had taken a rented farm as at board to attend. The result was that the obnoxious youth was obliged to leave the college. Good priesthood seems to be unkind to the Irish people that even the powerful tenantry are enthusiastic in its condemnation.

—Archbishop Riordan has issued a circular announcing to the Roman Catholic clergy of his archdiocese that the trophies will be taken up in all the churches of the diocese on the first Sunday in July, and that the money will be used for the purpose of Irish Sunday School under their control

A Travelling Plant.

To the number of curious plants, such as the carnivorous and fly-catching plant, a new specimen has lately been added, which is described as the travelling plant. It is said to be of the lily of the valley species (convallaria polygnanium), and has a root formed of knots, by which it usually advance about an inch during the time in which the plant was first rooted. Every year another knot is added, which drags the plant further on, so that in twenty years' time the plant has travelled about twenty inches from its original place.

The Discovery of Tea.

Tea, according to Chinese writers, was first discovered in the 5th century. An import was placed upon it by the Emperor Te-Tsung in 781. It was introduced into Japan from China in the 9th century. The Dutch introduced it into Europe in 1591. It was used in England on some rare occasions prior to 1657, and was sold at from £6 to £10 per pound. Millions of pounds weight of aloe, liquorice, and ash tree leaves are every year mixed with Chinese tea in England. The annual consumption of tea in Great Britain is 30,000,000 pounds, while that of all the rest of the civilized world only amounts to 22,000,000.

Try, Try Again.

You want to be good and are trying to be. Learn those two things—never to be discouraged because good things come slowly, and never to fail daily to do that good which lies next to your hand. Do not be in a hurry, but be diligent. Enter into that sublime patience of the Lord. Be charitable in view of it. God can afford to wait; why cannot we, since we have Him to fall back on? Impatience here is the perfect work, and bring forth her celestial fruit. Trust to God to weave your threads into the great web, though the pattern shows it not.

Women's Desired Reward.

Women excel men in the kind of response they are satisfied with. This is neither lea, tale, nor public glory. Woman is content if her husband be well cared and is appreciated, satisfied to have given comfort to those she more loves, and cheerfully happy in the sense of it. Women understand intuitively, while men learn only by degrees, and many men never learn at all, that the grand secret of happiness in human life consists in keeping the heart busy for the good of others. Very glorious is the privilege of being able to be the means of happiness in others, especially when they are beloved. Men go abroad to do it, but generally it is woman's; and being thus endowed, were a cousin possible, it would probably be found that, taking one with another, there are more happy women in the world than happy men. Men, naturally more selfish than women, love in order to be happy; women, on the other hand, are happy because they love.

A Pitiful Scene.

A pitiful story comes to us of a scene in a Philadelphia police station, where a rough tangle-haired woman, who had been arrested, had fought like a fury, and stormed at the officers in three languages, was followed up in a few hours later by a little tot of a girl, who looked from one officer to another, and asked them if they had put her mother in jail. She was so little that the policeman had to help her up the steps; but her she was in search of her mother; the degraded woman heard her voice and called to her. So they swung open the door and let her in, and the little thing asked her mother, are you in jail?" Then the baby dropped upon her knees upon the stone floor, and began to pray: "Now I lay me down to sleep, and I hope my mother will be let out of jail." Then were tears bought those rough men at the sound of that innocent voice, and not a man or woman brought into court the judge whipped to the bench to go home and try to be a better mother. It was the drink that made the trouble.

Danger of New Acquaintances.

"Girls," says an aristocrat contemporary, "beware of the transient young man. He is slick-tongued, perhaps, and well dressed, but can get footed by money or manners when you know thoroughly and don't know any serious ill about is worth a dozen of him. "This is sound advice. The transient young man is full of awful possibilities. Take him in and you may entertain an angel unawares, but there is also a chance that he will turn out to have escaped from somewhere. It is safest, especially if he threatens to stay, to make him feel the necessity of thoroughly accounting for himself. Make him explain why he did not stay at home, and see if he did not leave his last place because he was found out. In the eyes of the community in which he has lived from birth a young frog is always more or less of a tadpole. His friends are slow to recognize that he has lost his tail and has two hind legs and a bass voice. But the stranger whose first appearance is made in all the glory of the adult batrachian has no traditions to outgrow. No one ever saw him with a tail and few people believe that he ever had one. He has that advantage to the native. It is not a fair one, and he should not be allowed to profit by it.

Sickness on Farms.

One of the most common sources of disease in farmers' families is to be found in the cellars under their houses, filled with half decaying vegetables, the odors from which rise and fill every room. In some cases these cellars are never entirely cleansed from one year's end to another. If entirely dry potatoes and apples in limited supply may be stored in cellars, but they should be well looked after and decaying specimens removed as fast as found. If the cellar is not dry at all seasons, not only should no vegetables be kept in it, but the house above should be considered uninhabitable until it is made dry. The farmer himself may not become sick, but his wife and family almost certainly will, on account of being within doors so large a proportion of the time. The house well is very often a prolific cause of disease. During the past few months wells have been low in many parts of the country and the result has been an unusual amount of sickness in country places. Drinking the water down almost to the bottom of the well, families have taken in a larger proportion than usual of its impurities. Most old wells need thorough cleaning. In fact all wells should be cleaned as often as once in three or four years. Now while the water is low is the best time to do this work. When done, many will be surprised at the amount of filth removed from within the water of which they have perhaps been drinking for years.

Syrup of Figs.

Nature's own true Laxative. Pleasant to the Palate, acceptable to the Stomach, harmless in nature, painless in action. Cures habitual Constipation, Biliousness, Indigestion, and kindred ills. Cleanses the system, purifies the blood, regulates the Liver and acts on the Bowels. Breaks up Colds, Chills and Fevers, etc. Strengthens the organs on which it acts. Better than bitter, easier on Liver medicines, pills, salts and drastics. Sample bottles free, and large bottles for sale by all Druggists.

Family Fun.

He Was Rather Deaf.

A young man, who had formed an attachment to a young lady, went to her father's new home to ask his consent to their union. The old gentleman, who was terribly deaf, was standing on the doorstep as his daughter's lover approached. The lovers first door commended a view of the meadow in which a cow was feeding, and while Mr. B. was looking in that direction the youthful lover, whose heart was overflowing with emotion, commenced the task he came to perform.

"I am acquainted with your daughter," said he, in a loud tone.

"She is a fine beast," remarked the old gentleman, looking at the cow.

"Your daughter," the young man said. "I have the honor to be well acquainted with her."

"She is a noble animal," was the quiet reply.

["Confound the old cow!" said the young man, in a whisper. "I wish she was out of sight."]

"I was speaking about your amiable and accomplished daughter."

"She is very kind, indeed—never breaks down lemon—never kicks over the pail—never strays away like the other brutes I have."

"You don't understand me, sir! I was speaking of your daughter at boarding school."

"No, I never put a board on her face; she never does any mischief at all."

"Your daughter!" shouted the young man, frantic with sentiment.

"Yes—you say I ought to be?"

"No, sir! I was speaking of your daughter, the young lady—your daughter."

"Oh, yes—I have plenty of room; but I think she has got to be old enough to keep much longer. To tell the truth I have made up my mind to shut her up in the stable, and feed her on chop stuff for a few weeks."

"Great heavens!" remarked the young man to himself. "What shall I do? I am deafness will be the death of me. I will try once more, and if the effect fails I will resort to pencil and paper."

"I should like to say a word or two to you respecting your daughter."

"I shall let the butcher have her by-and-by—if he will give my price. I want the money with emphasis.

As a last resort the young man used his pencil and paper—showed his letters of introduction, handsome presents, and the whole opinion was good authority on the question on the topic. After a little cross-questioning, and a little hesitation, the old gentleman gave his consent, and when the happy pair were married he declared it was the best bargain he had made in all his life.

How Preachers Travel.

Mrs. Fogg—"Our dear minister is back again, and it is perfectly splendid to hear him talk about the places he visited in Europe. His sermons are quite as interesting as a lecture." Mr. Fogg—"I hope so; it was in the agreement." Mrs. Fogg—"What do you mean, Mr. Fogg?" "Mean! Why, your dear minister is paying up. I supposed you knew that he got a pass through Europe on condition that he should preach the old country up after he got home."

A Slight Misunderstanding.

"Do they have home-cooking days in heaven me?" a little Somerville girl inquired, the other day.

"Why, certainly not, dear; what put that into your head?"

"Because the angels sweep; don't they?" "What gave you such an notion as that?" "Well, I thought I heard you say so. Don't they? I was sitting on the stoop, and you and your father were talking in the parlor, and I heard you say that a wife left her husband because he was tired out. In the eyes of the community in which he has lived from birth a young frog is always more or less of a tadpole. His friends are slow to recognize that he has lost his tail and has two hind legs and a bass voice. But the stranger whose first appearance is made in all the glory of the adult batrachian has no traditions to outgrow. No one ever saw him with a tail and few people believe that he ever had one. A CRUSHING REPLY.

[CONCLUDED FROM FIRST PAGE.]

1885,) to the Guardian and Church Times, each containing certain retractations and emendations, and corrections of mistakes which had been pointed out, the author, in a new edition of his book, published in 1881, presumed no less than twenty-nine pages of missing printed "additions and corrections" (mainly the latter), each page containing forty-six lines, and each line about ten words, thus making no less than 13,340 words of retractation—a somewhat unprecedented and startling literary performance, and a remarkable example of original slip slop and random accusation—for a person who, continuing the saints, correcting the Popes, and snubbing the Cardinals, claims to teach and teach other people, and whose book in its totality does not extend to two hundred pages. Every true scholar has received from such corrections, while in several cases the corrections are equally inaccurate with the statements pronounced to be correct.

TABULATED STATEMENT OF CURBINGINIA AND SERAFIA.

The various erratis and explanatory additions referred to, as can be ascertained at a mere glance, amount, I am given to conclude, to exactly two hundred and one. These which will probably be set forth at length in a future publication—are, of course, of different kinds, some more important than others, and have been thus carefully tabulated by self and two friends:

Corrigenda and Errata.—Regarding historical or traditional facts, 31; regarding dogmatic facts, historical and theological, 63; regarding quotations, either first or second hand, from writers on history and canon law with inaccurate references from uncertain premisses, 26; regarding historical and theological quotations half-truths, often with certain remarkable omissions or qualifications; and consequently, for purposes of controversy, impertinent and unfairly quoted, 30; regarding short scraps of quotations from Fathers, which, when sought out and studied are found to bear an entirely different meaning from that with which, for controversial purposes, they were adduced, 12; pedantry, or the correcting of Plain Reasons has, on no less than seven occasions, made mistakes in confusing the personal origin of Gallican writers on dogma, canon law, or ecclesiastical history with the defined and authoritative faith of the Catholic Church—a somewhat serious series of substantial errors, 17; furthermore, in seven cases he has assumed the certain correct opinions—highly probable opinions, nodoubts, but as yet only opinions—are with certainty doubt dogmatic facts, sacred dogma, and part of the unchangeable divine deposit, and has argued accordingly. This is certainly far short of the "opinions of several Popes or canonical saints are opinionus and nothing more. Such opinions are not imposed on the faithful, and may be dautned" from the Catholic Pulpit, 7; Total, 201.

THE DOCTRINE OF INTENTION.

Several of this above referred to corrigenda and sub-added notes contain several other retractations, further detailed explanations, and careful epistemology away of grave mistakes. The artificial and insincere sentiment (and I must add supreme nonsense) which is found regarding the doctrine of intention—a doctrine as familiar to law as to theology, to and other sacts, where should we be if—is so utterly puerile and ridiculous, that it can only take in those who are anxious to be deluded. If one man, in the presence of another, apparently executing a legal deed, deliberately and openly declares, "I do not deliver this as my act and deed"—the proper intention in waiting, and the signed instrument is probably void, and certainly open to have its value contested. Supposing that when the apparent intention has been found to have been absolutely with-held.

ADVERSE PROTESTANT CRITICISMS OF DR. LITTLEDALE.

Many of the criticisms in question, though maintained with some show of learning, are assuredly enough measured at their true values by those Anglicans competent to form an opinion. Dissenters having placed at my disposal numerous comments upon the book criticised, I select a few as evidence that the Protestant portion of the Church of England is not alone in thinking that the new and destructive policy embodied in Plain Reasons is by many repudiated; its method being mistrusted, its tone gross and unchartable language deplored, and its conclusions rejected. Some of the clergymen in official places, who are so ready and even valuable to condemn in private, would have the courage of their opinions in public. But this courage is a courageous age. Wills are too often weak, and moral backbones either disjointed or broken.

An Honorary Canon of Oxford Cathedral writes:

"No long experience of Plain Reasons has proved to me that the plan of appealing to mere reason, and bringing everything down to its own level, in dealing with Romanism, is likely to be turned to a deadly account in dealing with the great dogmas of the Trinity and of God manifest in the flesh. . . . I have two at least whom the book has made free and Roman, and then so fling in debt."

Another clergyman of the Diocese of Oxford writes: "In my parish and neighborhood it has done more harm than good, making the readers, in some cases, often more believers, and then Christians unsettled. . . . In others it has sent doubt and shocked by its unpleasant cynicism, over to Rome."

Mr. Shirley Brebanon, of Stoke, Oxfordshire, expressed in public (Lib. of October 1881) the following sentiment: "A book which has been corrected in nearly a hundred cases of statement, should have been first submitted to some competent author . . . . . before being put in print. It shakes our confidence in the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, and it is not en dit able that no expression of regret was made by the committee for the circulation of errors and fictions. Dishonesty in controversy, especially in religious controversy, seem when resulting from want of necessary inquiry deliberately, is much to be deprecated."

Dr. Mossman, of Torrington, Lincolnshire, in 1881, wrote thus: "The book appears to me to be written in a most reprehensible spirit. Unless exposed and refuted, it is calculated to do grievous harm to the blessed and holy cause of corporate reunion. The book cannot, of course, mislead any one who is really acquainted with ecclesiastical history and dogmatic theology, but how many few of its readers will know that it is little more than a crude congeries of fallacy and unfounded statements, taken at second hand, which have been exposed and refuted again and again."

Another clergyman of the Diocese of Salisbury, writes: "I am not prepared to favor the malice and malevolence of (a certain religious newspaper), otherwise I could easily point out a score of mistakes and misrepresentations of Roman Catholics, to our relations with the saints in glory—their help, our duty."

A Rector in Kent, in a published letter in 1885, put on record his judgment as follows: "That such a book should be issued at all by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge is a sign of desolation, and a bad sign, too. For to drive more wedges into the breach between us and Rome, and to make it bigger and wider, is not to my mind the work of a Catholic (!) priest, now that irreligion, unbelief, and profanity are extending so."

The Rev. Wentworth Huckey, of Christ Church, Oxford, in August, 1881, wrote thus: "I shall be much obliged if you will allow me, as an Anglican priest, to express my preference for Littledale's part to his present views, to express the shame and indignation with which I have found in the first regarded the publication of Plain Reasons. Since the issue of translations into French and Italian, the claim of the work to be Catholic sense and sound argument can no longer be sustained; and considering what manner of men are the vast majority of the Church's enemies in France and Italy, I grieved in the name of our common Christianity against any such attempt to weaken the hands of the Church."

HANDLING OF LITTLEDALE "WITHOUT GLOVES."

The Rev. E. W. Hulbert remarked of the author's controversial writings that they are "so evidently dictated by ill-feeling and prejudice, and the raise of good breeding so completely ignored by him, that a reader of any refinement of mind cannot really draw back from one who seems thus regardless of the first principles of Christian moderation and ordinary charity." Adding, with much force and truthness of "I limn Romans." "Entirely negative in character, it is, moreover, a coarse, illiberal, brutal book, without grace and without justice—a book whose spirit has nothing in common with a fair and upright mind."

I am informed by persons who know them that Canon Liddon, Canon Carter, Bishop King, Bishop West of Lincoln, Mr. H. M. Benson of Cowley, Mr. Chandler Wagner, and others, have expressed their dislike of the methods, assumptions, and style of reasoning of "Plain Reasons," in terms more or less in harmony with the various sentiments just quoted.

THE DOCTRINE OF THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION.

To return to the book itself. As regards the important Doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, which has always been held by the Catholic Church, it is sufficient to quote the first Bishop of Norwich, Herbert de Losinga (1091-1119) who, "a light in a dark place, shone out and studied are found to bear an entirely different meaning from that with which, for controversial purposes, they were adduced, 12; pedantry, or the correcting of Plain Reasons has, on no less than seven occasions, made mistakes in confusing the personal origin of Gallican writers on dogma, canon law, or ecclesiastical history with the defined and authoritative faith of the Catholic Church—a somewhat serious series of substantial errors, 17; furthermore, in seven cases he has assumed the certain correct opinions—highly probable opinions, nodoubts, but as yet only opinions—are with certainty doubt dogmatic facts, sacred dogma, and part of the unchangeable divine deposit, and has argued accordingly. This is certainly far short of the "opinions of several Popes or canonical saints are opinionus and nothing more. Such opinions are not imposed on the faithful, and may be dautned" from the Catholic Pulpit, 7; Total, 201.

The Rev. Wentworth Huckey, of Christ

A SCIENTIFIC FACT.

"Royal" the only Baking Powder free from Lime and Absolutely Pure.

Lime is the serious defect found in most of the cream of tartar baking powders. As a matter of fact, chemical analysis has found it in all such powders except the "Royal." Its presence is caused by the use of adulterated cream of tartar in the effort to reduce their cost of production.

Lime adds to the weight while it detracts from the strength of the baking powder. It also renders the food less wholesome giving rise to dyspepsia and kindred ailments. Baking powders containing lime produce less leavening gas, and therefore in use are more expensive. [illegible] pure article.

The Royal Baking Powder is made from cream of tartar that is first specially refined and made chemically pure. No tartrate of lime or other impurity can find its way into the "Royal," and to this fact its great superiority in strength, wholesomeness, and keeping quality is due.

All this adds greatly to the cost of manufacturing the Royal Baking Powder, but as all its ingredients are selected and prepared with the same precise care and regardless of labor or expense, an article is produced that is free from every extraneous substance—"absolutely pure." Nor does it contain any ingredients except those necessary to make a pure, wholesome, and perfect baking powder.

Professor McMurtrie, late chemist in chief to the U. S. Department of Agriculture, after analyzing the various baking powders of the market, testifies to the absolute purity of that used in the Royal Baking Powder as follows:

"I have examined the cream of tartar manufactured by the New York Tartar Company and used by the Royal Baking Powder Company in the manufacture of their baking Powder, and find it to be perfectly pure, and free from lime in any form.

Poetry

OUR LADY'S GIFT.

Said my heart of hearts, who elapses
Both the vast yet moderate leases
Of Our Lady and her Spouse, and longs in love
to wend their abodes,
"Could you find some happy flowers
For the Sacramental bower,
On the altar while to die, and yield their fragrance
in divine incense?"

So, with doubting heart, I wound
Up the aisle and sweet grove
Where the cactus roses lit their crown o'er the tabernacle door.
(Where the sister-living priest,
Unto our Lady's great, tearful feast,
Showed how Evil rules this new world by her right of Faith Victor).

And I saw a screen white
Glittering, as a moonlit night
In another land, while round it broke the blossoms, yea, I mean
"Ah, see Mother as one Son,
Make in love all nations one,
Smiled the ancient Guadalupe, to Saint Mary's latest Diana.

Each doth nestle, in the still,
Neath a Heavenward lifted hill,
'Neath a Mount of Peace, resembling of the beloved the Saviour Isrel,
And the new voice of their bells
Is angelic echoes with
On the steeps rest sun and starlight, like the seasons smile of God!

Heaven shamed our lack of trust
With a mere lie in the dust
While I sank the rocks, where secret sages greed
she, I yet unbelief
To earth's joy how I am blind!—
Sorrow, why am I dull,
As the springing at her bidding, myriad flowers of Maryyrd?

Mother, thy reproof is sweet!
To thy Spouse this gift to meet,
Mellow tweaed, white-breathing, glowing, with the sensible as a flower,
Yet, in Heaven's light, a thing!
It will bless our Sacred King,
Who will find the gold, myrrh, incense, thou hast treasured, in the flower

A SIGH FOR OLD TIMES.

O! God be with the good old times when I was twenty-one.
In "Tipperary among the bushes" where the Flies
and Mosses run;
When my heart was gay and merry—racked not those of care or woe!
Rolling in the fields of Derry ringing o'er the sunny Foyle.

When lightsome as the summer breeze I wild-tied cares away,
Among the fields and meadows fair, by Mourne's winding way,
Or by the shade of Knock-a-ve bedecked with heather brown,
Then rise to the Mourne's shore, and guards
my native town.

Then I was a stout young man of Shrahane but memory treasures still,
From Milltown side to Crohan's side but has my right good will
And all that I have said and true, I loved in life's young day,
While roaming over hills in reckless glee by many a bank and brae.

The "Cooler Hill," my play ground—was our camp the "Cottage Lea."
Within the glen, where sallowed men in other days roamed free!
Ah! Hills of green with white-capped waves with merry noise and din,
Ah! where the sunshine day away upon the
"Point of Fire?"

Time passes, yes, time passes, and I feel it at market and at fair,
Yet kindly Boys, with hearts of hearts, would meet their sweethearts there;
Ah! where the fair was over, how they'd coax
the girls away,
With honeyed tongue and roguish eye to hear the piper play.

And O! the merry, merry dance—the music's maddening tune—
"The wind that shook the barley" shook
Ann Kitty—dard-eyed Kitty—that outshone
the moon!
Ah! Kitty—dard-eyed Kitty—that outshone
the moon!
Ah! Kitty—dard-eyed Kitty—that outshone
the moon!

THE MONITOR.

TWENTY-EIGHTH YEAR OF PUBLICATION.

THE MONITOR has the largest circulation of any Religious Paper published on the Pacific Coast.

WEDNESDAY JULY 8, 1885.

MISSION OF THE CATHOLIC PRESS.

"Journalism is the greatest social power, because it is the chief agent in popularizing ideas; and popular ideas constitute opinion, which governs the world. In our view, religious journalism is not only the most important, but the most powerful, and consequently the most efficacious, by a vast or some leagues. What is and what ought to be the object of Catholic journalism but to conduct every soul behind the truth, whatever it may be—across all the Divine truth—to the Divine Author of truth and of souls?

"May this blessed work always take instrument in St. Francis de Sales, under whose protection they wish to be placed, the science of Catholic journals, and adopt the motto of religion, the rights and those of the Holy Church, the rights of the people, the principles and principle of Christian and Catholic journals and principle with devotion and fidelity.—Pius IX.

Editorial Notes.

—During the month of May 11,663 emigrants left Ireland (according to the Board of Trade returns), being 4,030 less than the number for the corresponding month of 1884. During the five months ending May 31, 20,460 emigrants left Ireland as compared with 38,685 for the same period last year.

—The misery of having too much wealth was illustrated recently in the case of a Frenchman named Combeville, who lived near St. Denis, and recently inherited 50,000 francs. The money worried him. How to take care of it, how to invest it, and how to guard against thieves and sharpers puzzled him during the day and kept him awake in the night. At last he couldn't stand the annoyance of riches any longer. So he hanged himself. And this money sometimes bores people.

—When Mgr. Goddard lately celebrated his silver jubilee at St. Mary's Church Chinchiura, the poor ex-Empress Eugenie, who is one of his parishioners, wrote him a note of congratulation in which she said "I am left alone, the sole remnant of a shipwreck which proves how fragile and vain are the grandeurs of this world. What a grand example of the folly of imagining that wealth, power, or primacy position can secure happiness here or hereafter! This world is all a fleeting show, there's nothing true but heaven.

—It would seem as if what a preacher we allended to last week called "the Corner-stone of Protestantism" was a mistake, from Scandinavia and was destined to be transplanted to Salt Lake as the corner-stone of Mormonism. By the steamship Wisconsin, which arrived in New York last Wednesday, more than ten hundred recruits for Mormonism came from Denmark, Sweden and Norway, where Protestantism prevails! History is repeating itself: The corner-stone of Protestantism was lost; Mormonism has precisely the same foundation, and thus the followers of Luther are returning legitimately to Luther's first love.

—Just as we anticipated last week, it appears that the embargoes from Rome against the Pope had changed his policy towards his Italian persecutors, was false in every particular. The more recently manufacturing telegrams coming from Rome, with the exception of those which represent the Pope as hostile to the Italian ministry for the purpose of inflicting injuries on the Sovereign Pontiff, has also been authoritatively denied. From the number of bogus telegrams sent from Rome it would seem as if the Father of Lies was chief cook of all the telegrams from that portion of the globe.

—We call the attention of our readers to Father Gleeson's announcement in another column, in which he informs the Catholic population of this vicinity that the corner stone of St. Anthony's Church will be laid on Sunday the 19th inst. Every Catholic will rejoice to notice the progress of the Church, and especially that full for the erection of larger churches, and we hope to see the Catholic societies of this city, Oakland and adjacent places take steps to be present en masse on this occasion, and thus lend a helping hand where help is needed, as Father Gleeson's congregation have done a great deal already, and the burden of building a $17,000 church should not be left entirely on them.

—The late Confederate General, Robert E. Lee, paid, according to the Rev. George W. Pepper, the following high compliment to Thomas Francis Meagher and the men of his command: "I then mentioned," says Mr. Pepper, "the name of Thomas Francis Meagher, as the popular idol of the Northern Irishmen. 'Yes,' said Gen. Lee, 'Meagher on your side, though not Osborne's equal in military genius and experience, rivalled him in bravery and in the affections of his soldiers. The heroic stand and desperate though fruitless gallantry of that brigade of Meagher's upon the heights of Fredericksburg, never have been equalled. Though totally routed they reaped a harvest of glory. Their reckless and splendid charge upon our lines carried the heartiest applause of our soldiers and officers. Meagher was the bravest of the brave.'"

—Rev. McCrary of the Methodist Advocate seems to have felt the shot and shell hurled at him recently through our columns for calling Catholics "idolaters" and "blasphemers" because we venerate the Blessed Virgin. Our Methodist brother, as hope, will learn from the lesson thus taught him that he cannot calumniate Catholics without receiving a rebuke for his falsehood. No Methodist person or other Protestant preacher or layman shall ever throw mud at the Mother of God without receiving mental chastisement therefor, as long as the ordinance of God's truth finds a place in the manhood of the MONITOR. "The way of the transgressor is hard," and the best way to keep out of trouble for sectarians, is "paddle their own canoe" and not to undertake to navigate the bark of St. Peter according to Protestant notions. No Methodist is competent to speak of the Mother of God, for the reason that they cannot comprehend the exalted position she occupies in Christianity, hence they should shield their ignorance in their silence, and thus save themselves from slandering their Catholic neighbors.

Mgr. Capel Scores the Slandering Pixley.

It is one of the characteristics of the calumniator to be a coward, and in proof of the truth of this assertion we have only to point to the editor of the Argonaut, who, on different occasions, has refused to permit the innocent victims of his ruffianly assaults the right to reply in his columns to the baseless charges with this unscrupulous malignor manufactured against them. Pixley well knows that to permit the truth to be printed in the pages of his paper would expose his venality to the eyes of his readers, hence he publishes every evil thought that emanates from his putrid mind concerning the Catholic Church, the popes, prelates, priests and people, and then—when any of them ask a hearing—the calumniating coward refuses the request! Such conduct stamps this vile slanderer as among the basest bigots, and proves that he uses the press merely to gratify his hatred against Catholic God and all who wear His livery.

When Pixley first assailed the private character of Mgr. Capel, that estimable ecclesiastic sent a brief note to the Argonaut, asking the publication of a denial of the calumnious charges "in a spirit of truth and justice." But Mgr. Capel little knew the cowardly character he had to deal with, to whom "truth and justice" are as foreign as they were to Judas Iscariot. Hence Pixley refused to permit Mgr. Capel to refute the ribald slanders which had appeared in the Argonaut against him! Yet this is the fanatical falsifier who prates so loudly about "American manhood" of which he has about as much conception as a gorilla has of the charity of the Good Samaritan. Such conduct cannot fail of convincing every man—we care not what his creed or country may be—that this vile calumniator of other men's characters is a disgrace to American journalism, and a knowledge of Pixley's rank injustice to his fellow man will enable every reputable citizen to place a proper value upon every charge brought by this disreputable malignor against the Church or individuals at its proper value.

After giving a flat denial to every word of detraction uttered against him by the Amazon of the Argonaut, Mgr. Capel thus scores his slanderer by proving from his own paper that no venal was his mind as to lead him to believe that to bear false witness against one's neighbor is a meritorious deed! Here are the concluding remarks in Mgr. Capel's scathing refutation of Pixley's cowardly attack upon him in his paper:

If, sir, in these matters of fact you have so grievously erred when the truth could have been easily ascertained, what is to assure the public that your statements of Mr. Pope, the diplomacy statement about Gallicanism, the points of Catholic teaching, you should be so grisly at me, to put it in the most modest way.

But I ought to have expected this from your issue of July 7, 1883, you teach: "The man who will not be under certain conditions an gentleman. The woman who will not for under peculiar circumstances is to the last degree unwomanly. To the—under certain circumstances—a virtue." And beyond the end of the article you respond to the question with which it opens: "Is it right or wrong under any condition to lie?" by saying, "Whether an interrogator is male or female, old or young, we have no means of ascertaining." Our answer is: "As under certain conditions is only right and excusable, but it is a duty."

Such morals is now distinguishable, unworthy of men and of Christians. So far as I am concerned, I prefer to be a Christian.

Pixley, I suppose, is a man who makes it a habit to utter a deliberate falsehood, if he thinks it necessary, or to be guilty of injuring another, should hurt his or his friends's profit. The man or woman who will do this, whatever malice utter a scandalous lie should have no place in decent society.

*There are two statements, I remember, that the three falsehoods, which I have called, I send over your dicum. When then, do you send the mahl to ask for the head and tongue of the editor of the Argonaut on a dish? I am, respectfully yours,*

T. J. CAPEL.

False Host, July 1.

Dr. Stebbins' Singular Sermon.

Under the title of "Eccentricities of Protestantism" a very interesting compilation could be made of the incomprehensible foolish and unstable ideas advanced by Protestant preachers under the pretense that they are preaching Christianity. The latest preacher who has performed this pulpit eccentricity is Dr. Stebbins, the electric light of Unitarianism, who, in his sermon on last Sunday told his hearers this apparently ridiculous story

The preacher then spoke at some length of the three great religious representatives of Christ—Confucianism, Judaism and Christianity. Confucianism was the religion held by one third of the human race. It was nonsense to talk of a religion, for there was no such religion.

Why, if Dr. Stebbins would take a look into a mirror he would behold the profile of a prominent a teacher of false religions as ever fed his flock upon the husks of hasty. And when the Doctor had thus held the mirror up to nature, if he would just open his bible he would find a dozen pages of scripture flatly contradicting the bogus Christianity he so dogmatically sets forth. St. Matthew must have had the Doctor "in his mind's eye" when he wrote that "there shall arise false christs, and false prophets; and shall show great signs and wonders, insomuch as to deceive (if it were possible) even the elect." The unity of faith could not be more expressly set forth for man's enlightenment than it is by St. Paul when he declares that there can be but "One Lord, one faith, one baptism." We have innumerable other proofs in scripture of the falsehood of Dr. Stebbins' declaration. There have been false religions from the very beginning and they exist to-day. Every sect in the world—from Mormon to Mormon, from Antenomian to Unitarian—are as false and as foul in the sight of God as are the diabolical deeds of the Fiend himself. Has not God Himself said of false Christians: "They confess that they know God, but in their deeds they deny him; being abominable, and incredulous, and to every good work reprobate." And this is a faithful picture of those false prophets of false religions which abound in the world, and which are well represented in the fabulous Stebbins.

—If the calculation of a German theatrical review may be trusted, the total number of Catholic Missionaries is at present 6,700, thus divided: Capuchins, 1,600; Franciscans, 2,000; Oblates, 300; Priests of the Foreign Missions, 700; Jesuits, 15,00; Lazarists, 200; Dominicans, 500, the remainder of various congregations, or seculars.

The Strange Story of Another Singular Conversion.

We never hear the story of singular circumstances which converts are led into the Catholic Church, but we become more and more convinced that the days of miracles have not passed away. Already in these columns we have cited several remarkable instances of the conversion—in a really miraculous manner—of many non-Catholics who were led into the fold of the true fold of Christ, and so will it continue to be to the end, because the mercy and compassion of God are immeasurable and as extensive as eternity itself.

About a year ago a legal gentleman, who is a convert himself, and who is well and favorably known throughout California, and particularly in this city, came into the MONITOR office and told us of a niece of his residing in Texas who was not a Catholic and whose conversion to Catholic truth was the most ardent wish of his daily prayers. Last week the same gentleman came to us with tears of joy in his eyes, and gratitude to Almighty God in his heart, and conveyed to us the glad tidings that his beloved niece had—of her own volition, and under Divine inspiration—embraced the Catholic faith!

We have before us the beautiful letter of the lady in question, in which she relates the remarkable manner of her conversion, but lack the pages—overflowing with fervent thoughts of love and joy at entering what she truly calls: "My Father's House,"—we condense the following narrative of the many obstacles the writer overcame in her search for the true path that leads to heaven.

For several months the health of the lady whose conversion we are about to record, was very poor, and, finally, it was pronounced by her husband and friends to go to New Orleans, where—as she had learned—there were priests and nuns, two branches of the human family she had never set eyes upon, there being neither Priests, Nuns or a Catholic Church in the part of Texas where this lady resided. When the party arrived at Houston, the desire to see the Catholic Church for the first time was so strong upon this lady that she went at once to search of one, which she thus describes in her letter:

"We had a day at Houston, and although broken down and tired from travelling, I started out to find the Catholic Church, being under the impression that it was always open and that I would have no difficulty in going in. For years I had dwelled with eager interest pictures of Cathedrals. You can imagine my feeling of awe when I came before my eyes a real Catholic Church."

The Church in question was undergoing repairs, so that the long wished for sight of the interior could not be accomplished, as the party left Houston the next morning. As the party travelled through the State of Louisiana, the throbbing heart of the lady whose conversion was greatly delighted to see "standing out conspicuously in every little village where the train stopped, a church which I knew to be Catholic, because surrounded by the Cross."

The party finally arrived at New Orleans, and on Easter Sunday a visit was made to the Cathedral, which is so interestingly described by the writer that we give her version of the circumstance:

"I had asked the lady in charge to show me the Cathedral, and she had kindly consented, accompanied by another lady, strangers in their choices; but that I would not be disturbed by them, I had to watch and I heard much of the old Cathedral, and especially the Cathedral painting in its dome, and so how glad I was to be able to visit it. But what I saw was disappointing. I had searched out every room in the place, and from where I stood I could see the entire place. Accordingly I stolen to go up into the gallery where I could sit on the seats and enjoy the building up and down at my leisure. Finally, I could command a view of the whole interior, and I was soon absorbed in the beauty of the place. Masses were in French; and the paintings failed to compare with those of Paris, I have seen in the Le Holy Catholic Church, and I stood on my feet, fascinated, looking until I could no longer fitting near me was a very pale but dead sick lady, who, I felt, was evidently very poor, so I determined to ask the dear old lady if I could give her a Catholic priest. When the congregation began to disperse I stood by her side and asked her if she was Catholic. She was not, but said, finally, she asked me if I was a Catholic. I told her that I wanted to see her comfortable first, but I thought, yes, she could speak to me. I then said to her that I was a Catholic, and I told her how I was when she talked in French, and who very politely and kindly offered to send me a priest. I was afraid to trust me alone with strangers and would have asked her to go my hotel.

Both ladies went with me some distance in the direction whither the old lady had pointed, through a side door to the right of the church, and I thought of Christ's words: 'I was a stranger and you took me in.' Yes, you could speak only a little French, and I could speak only a little Spanish, and yet we understood each other. I would repeat every little word I knew with me; I will always feel that I was in the presence of angels. I was so tired, so trembling, so weak, so dizzy, so worried, and so happy, that I could not remember half of what I learned; but I learned enough to know that I was a Catholic, until at last I became frightened at the strength of my feelings, and I felt like a prodigal, and was completely unnerved by loss of rest and anxiety. I thought to myself that those Catholics are wicked and what am up to them? I felt that I could go back to my home where I am and get me out. So, finally, at the dead of night I left my lady with a priest, I started to ascend, I cried out: 'O! I can go no further! I am lost!' Then I felt a presence at my bed side and I opened my eyes, and looking up saw a tall, dark, handsome man, with a long black robe on, and a long black beard, and after speaking a few kindly words he was gone. I felt that I was the Jewish church, where I was to see him next day.

The following morning my husband and I started out to search for the church, and after some time we reached it. But the lady looked very cold and calculating to me, and, indeed, it was some little encouragement from my husband before I would venture to enter. It was my second time, and my husband had met a priest of gentleman who came to the door in answer to our ring, and who had spoken to him. The priest was one who had spoken only a few words I was not in the church, but I felt that I was at once I learned to cultivate this acquaintance.

We were ushered into a parlor and I saw a man with a long black Father entered, and listened humbly to my story as I told him of my secret desire to become a Catholic. Then he explained many things to me regarding Catholic faith; and I felt that I was in a place as it were, and no step by step into the "one true fold of the one true shepherd." When he had concluded, he said: 'Now, indeed, you are in your Father's House.' Before our departure the Father gave me some books of instruction to read and study, and promised to examine, or so to prepare my mind for Catholic baptism, which I was to receive in a few days. Before we left, the good priest had procured a good mother for me, who—in a few days thereafter—he found that I understood the nature of her sacraments and the faith of the Catholic Church, I had the supreme happiness to become a child of the Church, and to be entitled to the glorious name of a Roman Catholic!

On the following Sunday night we attended mass from at the Jesuit Church, and although I had been ill I believe, it appeared to me as if everything about it looked more bright and beautiful, now that I could discern them through the eyes of faith. The columns and arches were conspicuous in white and gold, and high up into the glistening silver was a beautiful statue of the Blessed Virgin Mary, around which were burning many candles. The church is called "The Church of the Immaculate Conception." I thought it was as heavenly, far surpassing anything I had ever heard or dreamed of in the world."

The next morning was the time Father Fouché appointed for my baptism, and instead, I was overjoyed at the happiness of being received into the Church, and after the ceremony was concluded, and my name entered upon the register of those who have children of the one Mother Church, I sprinkled myself with holy water, and then I went out into the world with a heart surcharged with happiness at realizing that I was in fact and in truth—a Catholic—a cross that I sincerely pray may say one day in accordance with the Divine Mandate.

Such is the simple but singular narrative of a convert who had never seen or conversed with a Priest or Sister or bar lie prior to her visit to New Orleans. Without any Catholic influence around her, she was led into seeking a Catholic home, and this lady was unconsciously drawn into the fold of Christ! No worldly influence could have induced such a change of heart, but the act was the result of that religious power which ever penetrates the ear of God.—Tablet.

This conversion is purely the result of prayer on the part of Catholic relatives and other religious people, and of pious reading on the part of the lady herself. Through reading Catholic books and papers she was led to see how false were the slanders against the Catholic Church which she was forced to believe through the pauperizing prejudice of false teachers by whom her mind had been fettered, and who are uniquely in all things Catholic. Yet, by what a simple act of God was not all this antipathy overcome! Her husband was sent by her to celve Catholic baptism by the all powerful operation of prayer!

Now that this sweet soul has been made so supremely happy by the supplications of those who were removed from her by thousands of miles, may we not confidently ask the prayers of Catholic readers that the hope for the conversion of the husband of that lady who was thus so miraculously led into the Catholic Church?

The Growth of Female Religious Orders.

A lady has recently written an article in the London Pall Mall Gazette—which we publish on the third page of the issue of the MONITOR—in which she contends that there has been during recent years a very marked increase in the number of Religious Orders in the Catholic Church, as well as a wonderful increase in the numerical strength of every Sisterhood of women or modern growth. Remarking upon this statement the New York Sun—non-Catholic—presents the following facts, which will interest Catholic readers. "In modern desire of women to extend the range of their activity, which is shown in their pursuit of greater political and industrial opportunities, is also, even in this age of religious skepticism, impelling extraordinary great numbers of them to undertake the self-sacrificing work of those sisterhoods. The widespread anxiety among earnest and serious souls, because of the increasing activity of women, is another cause of women of the most delicate sensibilities and finest education throw themselves into the ranks of the Sisterhoods. Nowhere—not only by the Catholics, Mennonites—are so many well-educated women to be found as in the needed service to the poor, the sick, and the unfortunate.

"Nowhere else at Rome, we are told, is it exactly known how many nees there are in the world, and only the Bishop of each diocese knows what is in his keep in sight every non of whom he is the chief pastor, nobody could state the number under his charge. But in France alone there are certainly more than a hundred thousand, and they are multiplying throughout the world. Nuns are everywhere at work, and, almost before we know it, there will be a new nun, a colony of nuns from Verona had confronted him, and had made ready for martyrdom rather than separate.

For instance, there is the Sisters of Mercy congregation, which was founded as lately as 1831 by a young Irish lady and two associates, and whose work is mainly "a most serious application to the instruction of the poor girls, visitation of the sick, and protection of distressed women of good character." They now scout 133 houses in Great Britain and Ireland, besides many in North and South America, Australia and New Zealand. The nens of the Good Shepherd, specially vowing to "employ themselves in the instruction of penitent women," have almost 1830 founded communities in the four quarters of the globe, and are rapidly increasing. The great congregation of the Sacred Heart, established by Sophie Herat, and sanctioned in 1826 by Rome after a long and "comparatively hidden existence," now has 5,000 women engaged chiefly in training the daughters of well-to-do parents, "earning, indeed, the topsy by their devotion to the richer strata of society, where ignorance and bad example are probably the most dangerous.

Then there are the "Little Sisters of the Poor," a congregation founded a little over forty years ago, and which now numbers more than four thousand. They have established 230 houses in different parts of the world. In France the "Little Sisters of the Workingmen" is a community of recent organization, whose mission is altogether in workshops and factories.

These are only a few, and only the more modern, of the sisterhoods, for there are eighty-eight different orders or congregations at work in Paris alone, and in all there are "many hundred thousand saturated women, the flower of our civilization, working with success toward the reconciliation of labor and capital, of the learned and the ignorant."

Moreover, we are told that "the demand for their services is increasing beyond the development of their communities, extraordinary as it is," and that "including the communities that are allied to the Sisters of Charity by their rule, about a hundred thousand every year renew their vows, with few exceptions."

—The York Herald is responsible for the statement that Archbishop Croke will pay a visit to the United States in the coming Fall. It is also said that Bishop Fitzgerald will accompany him.

THE CHURCH AND FOOTMAN ON HELL-FIRE.

A Redemptorist Father Objects to Mr. Capel's Definition of the Fire of Hell.

St Peter's Church, July 5, 1885

Editor of the Monitor:

Dear Sir.—In your issue June 24, 1885, there appeared an article on Hell-fire by Monsignor Capel, in which that learned divine endeavors to quiet the mind of a certain "Pat" on the subject: "In there material fire in hell? Why really, said Patrick, we could not help thinking that by the time we got there we shall be so spiritualized that we could only endure it."

Now, I do not wish to be dogmatic, but I do not see why the Church cannot be allowed to, or should not, express her own ideas of the doctrine. Hell is such a terrible reality, and so terrible a punishment, that we should be the highest and most binding form of Catholic belief, that we simply the power of God to cast the soul into hell fire, and that God is not responsible or answerable for the eternal consequences of hell? Can the immortal soul be cast into hell fire? Is it not, or is it not, a Catholic doctrine? Is it not, are there not apostolic utterances in matters and sources of belief? Is not the Church the ever-enduring,

Farm and Home.

Over-Eating.

Physicians know that they must live by rule when attending cases during a pestilence. The body must be kept up in the health standard. In times of epidemics let everyone see to himself, attend to every rule of health, live regularly, and keep the stomach most carefully in order, and be abstinent. There is no rather way of defending the "Fortress of Life against its visible foes." "This living according to rule," said my friend, musingly, "is a terribly hard thing to have to hold. At least, I am sure most people find it so. "Few people," I replied, "think of doing anything of the sort until actual danger to life stares them in the face. Some one else, I believe, has made a remark similar to this before now, but it is worth of being repeated." "And it is true," he added. "I have been thinking a good deal lately—"Most people who are laid low do think." said. "I have been thinking, said my friend, "that most of us err by eating more than is necessary." How very true that is. Why, is careful regulation of diet—a diet that should incline to the abstemious—we have one of the best defences against trichinæ free of all kinds. This is one of our posts, and should be held at all risks, if we be careful for life at all—and not for life only, but comfort while we do exist. It is a fact which all should bear in mind, that over-eating not only corrupts the blood, but destroys nervous energy.

The Tidy Farmer.

One need not ask when passing a country residence whether it is in possession of a farmer Thrifty or a farmer Slack, for there are signs lying out boldly, speaking louder than words can do. Everyone has seen, somewhere in the home of the shiftless husbandman, and no quicker did the view fall upon the eye, than like the whole story was told in the mind; he lives there who is devoid of ambition and pride.

When a contrary view is presented; the fences are all up in order; buildings, if cheap and rude, in perfect repair; everything about the yard looking snug and tidy; implements all properly housed; stock made comfortable in winter, trees of fruit and shade planted into place, plentifully, and well cared for; it may be known that a thrifty, thoroughgoing, reading farmer has the place in charge.

Because a man has not abundance of capital to begin farming with, every convenience he could wish, and has to adopt cheap substitutes of building stock protections, is no argument against him as a husbandman; a shed and stable made of poles and straw, well constructed, tells a better story than a dilapidated frame barn; and as a house made of logs looks more inviting, when everything about it is clean and comfortable, than a mansion with surroundings showing neglect.

A good farmer who keeps everything up in good shape, has no more work than Mr. Slack, but has more enjoyment, more money and more friends.

Making Beds.

Let every bed maker, as soon as all the covers are spread, turn down the upper sheet, and all where it, leaving a generous margin below the bolster. Some people, you know, pull all the covers straight up to the top and lay the bolster upon them, so that when bedtime comes they must be arranged at the head. Boys don't like this way, and perhaps some other folks don't either. It is the custom to pile up two big, square, pillows on the top of the bolster, and then put on two pillow shams, and then, sometimes, or perhaps the bolster shams, a sheet sham. This is setting the trap for the unwary. Only a remarkably quiet person can properly lie down upon all this. Why not allow, if not altogether, abolish shams of all kinds? Why not honestly take off the big, square pillows and supply every bed with a comfortable bolster to take the place of pillows? If you like adornment, embroider or decorate the slips and sheets themselves without any make believe. Silk, lace and the like seem out of place on a bed which should suggest repose. Imagine a boy with big boots on flinging himself into the midst of a fairy creation of pink satin and trechon! Let beds be what they look like, and let them look like what they are—resting places. A great deal of attention should be given to the proper airing of the mattress every morning, and at least once a week a stiff brush should remove the dust which will accumulate, even in the best ordered house, around and under the ticking of cotton, or the bits of leather, or whatever is used to tack the mattress where the bread is sewed on, for dust with. Attention should also be directed to the edge of the mattress, side under that. Where the bedroom is also the dressing-room, dust cannot be avoided but it may at least be changed, and it need not be allowed to accumulate.

The Sort of Man It is not Right to Marry.

Don't marry a man who has spent his all in riotous living, and tells you that he is now going to get married and settle up.

Don't marry a man who has not the where-with to support you. You cannot live on love. "When poverty comes in at the door, love flies out through the window."

Don't marry a man for a home and a living, when by giving up your scarves and taking care of your health you can earn your own living and provide a home for yourself.

Don't marry a man to get rid of him, or oblige him, simply because he asks you. Don't marry in haste, but you repent at leisure. Love can wait. Don't, imagine because two persons are miserable when apart, they will be happy together.

Don't marry a fury sent. There are some young men who are so lazy that it almost requires an artist to draw their breath. Young men who have not ambition enough to labor under an impression. They live on the earnings of their pa until they find a girl who is fool enough to marry them, and they live off her pa. Look where you are going!

Don't marry a man to mend him or reform him. Such attempts are generally as vain and powerless as attempts to turn back the flowing tide with a wisp of straw, or outrear a hurricane with a tin whistle. A young man ruled by the hand of a beautiful girl. As she hesitated about replying, the young man said, "I await your answer with bated breath." The young lady answered: "Well, my dear sir, you will have to bait your breath with something besides high wines and Limburger cheese to catch me." Her hand was hers.

Family Fun.

She Meant Business.

"You see," she was explaining to a lawyer, after beating his counsel five down to three dollars, "I have a daughter Maria."

"Yes'm."

"Maria has a beau."

"Exactly."

"Has been waitin' on her for six years."

"I see."

"And I've been waitin' on her for the same length of time—waitin' for him to marry her."

"Justice, ma'am."

"How long should a couple spark?"

"Well, that depends. It takes some folks a long time to make up their minds."

"Isn't three years long enough?"

"I should think so."

"And I have, Mr. Jones. I'm getting madder and madder for the last three months, and finally last night I could not hold in any longer. I went into the parlor and there he was giggling and sinking and loving around same as five years ago. There was Maria simpering and cooing and acting like the same fool she always was. Don't talk to me! A gal can bring a beau to time inside of two years if she's got any mettle in her. You didn't fool away six years?"

"No'm."

"No! I, either. Well, I stood it as long as I could, and when I went into the room says I to William, says I—

"William, you're not and sir, and it is my duty as a mother to know if you intend to marry Maria.

"Maria she give a screech, and William he turned fiery red, but says I:

"If you love why don't you marry? If you are hanging around here to pass away time you'd better skip!

"Well, William coughed and gasped and stuttered around, and said he wanted to write to his uncle in Iowa.

"Your ma in Iowa?" says I, fearing my daughter's disappointment. "Maybe she wanted go?"

"Then he says he couldn't be baldheaded, and that one objection to marrying Maria was having mother's mother in law. Then the cyclone broke loose, the house, the wind. Also two or three earthquakes. Inside of four minutes Maria had fainted, William was a wreck, and we had spats the alone and blasted iron chairs. Maria got up and slipped out while I was holding camphor to Maria's nose, and I've heard to-day that he is after a warrant for me for assault with intent to kill. Can he get one?

"Yes'm.

"Can he do anything?

"Well, you want a—my—

"Sartin—sartin I'll go before a jury and tell 'em he and Maria have sat and sat for seventeen hundred nights—how I've had to be a sot up him—how I've waited up Maria to bring him to time—how I stood it and stood it until I couldn't hold no more—how it cost me $200 for fuel and grub, but that's all. If they are men they can't fail to render a verdict.

"No'm.

"Well, I'll go home and wait. Maria lies there sighing and weeping, and there's the score to pay up and the chain to mend, and if William gets the warrant I'll let you know. His ma is in Iowa. I'll let him know that somebody's ma in Detroit is alive and kicking and allus on deck."

Bill Nye on Parental Difficulties.

When the right kind of a man wakes up to find himself a parent, all his dozing enterprise goes away, and he sits in office in the presence of that extremely florid school of squirm dissatisfied and critical, solicitous and rattled. He finds that he knows less about the genesis business than he supposed. He cannot conceal the fact that he is green. All the "Family Physician" and "Every Man His Own Doctor" books that he has been reading lately have not taught him the little fat hands, resting so still and so white on the baby's breast that they seem to clench 24 on heart strings and rear and heavy on his heart.

If the baby is dead when he gets home he will be a murderer. People will point him out as he goes along the street and say, "There is a man who spanked his little child into an early grave."

He goes home early from his bootless day's work, trembling to know the worst. His wife tells him that the baby has poured a gallon of kerosene into the sugar barrel and salted the hens, and the poor man says "Thank God!" and his wife says, "George, have you lost that reasoning little mind that you used to amuse yourself with?"

Her sarcasm falls harmlessly on his happy breast. He then resolves that discipline may go to grass; he will not have the sight-seen spectacle of his dead baby hanging from dining business hours, he prefers a live Apache savage to a pale, silent, and well behaved ghost looking over his shoulder while he is trying to think of a hard word.

And so, for one cause and another, the proud and defiant young sang-froid of nineteen at last becomes the quiet, gentle, legal serf, with the pink and chubby foot of a baby across his neck, there is still discipline in the family, but it is not the kind he had advertised to make a tenant by his bona idea.

An old friend said to me not long ago: "I thought when you become a parent you intended to have discipline in your family. Instead of that you have to pray hour and make a jackass of yourself every time your children want just for. Seems to me I had announced for years that I was going to have discipline in my family. I'd have it now or bust."

"James," said I to him in a musical tone, "I don't believe you recognize discipline when you see it. The fact is, we have some discipline in our family and we know what to do with. I am getting a growth power I don't exactly understand a day and thirteen times a night, and I feel that it is making me a better man. We have a large amount of discipline at our house. There it is, where any of the family can see it. The children do not seem to crave it, so I am using it myself. I don't like to see anything wasted."

The Right Policy.

It is a matter of great importance for one to know where to place his wealth for safe keeping, and in a banking house that indulges in sporting speculations and stock gambling, that place is not safe. Hence, the importance of knowing the reputation, character, and, with it, the stability of the institution to which one may entrust his money. Hundreds of business men have made it their business to inquire into the reputation and character of the Liverpool and London and Globe Insurance Company, and have found it to be a conservative, safe, and reliable institution, and have placed their insurance with it. Thousands of others have not yet done so, but are doing it every day. Why not? Because it is the custom to pile up two big, square, pillows on the top of the bolster, and then put on two pillow shams, and then, sometimes, or perhaps the bolster shams, a sheet sham. This is setting the trap for the unwary. Only a remarkably quiet person can properly lie down upon all this. Why not allow, if not altogether, abolish shams of all kinds? Attention should also be directed to the edge of the mattress, side under that. Where the bedroom is also the dressing-room, dust cannot be avoided but it may at least be changed, and it need not be allowed to accumulate.

NEWS OF THE WORLD.

CABLEGRAMS FROM ALL COUNTRIES.

A Heroic Father.

MARYSVILLE, July 21.—At 1 o'clock last evening a call for help resounded in the house of James Haggerty, in the city, bearing a tale of blood-curdling horror and terror. Mrs. Haggerty was in the house at home and alone. Mrs. Haggerty was also slightly burned, and at one time her clothing was on fire. Haggerty is a member of the Fire Department, and, although his home was fire over him, by almost human efforts he succeeded in extinguishing the flames, which were burning himself, wife, baby and the house.

Russia Secretly Making Cannon.

LONDON, June 24.—A despatch received here says that an American, who recently passed through Vladivostock, arrived in Russian Port on the Black Sea coast, says there are many gun factories in full operation there, and that they are being worked secretly and under such disguising names as hospitals and asylums.

Honors for an Irish Patriot.

DUBLIN, June 24.—The Nationalists are making preparations to give a warm reception to Dr. Kevin Izod O'Doherty, who sailed from Sydney, May 8, for Ireland, his native land, which he left the last time twenty five years ago. Dr. O'Doherty was a prominent journalist in the troubles of 1848, and participated in the insurrection of that year. The Nationalists are held in Australia, the recent meeting of the Federal Council of the Irish-Australian League. Mr. Michael Davitt urges the Corporation of Dublin to vote to Dr. O'Doherty the freedom of the city on his arrival here.

Lord Chancellor of Ireland.

DUBLIN, July 1.—Lord Ashbourne, the Right Honorable Edward Gibson, today formally took the oath of office as Lord Chancellor of Ireland. The new Lord Chancellor was heartily received and greeted by the people in the streets on his way both to and from Dublin Castle, where the ceremonies of installation took place.

New Cardinals.

The names of the six prelates whom the Pope has decided to confer the cardinal's hat at the consistory are as follows: Archbishop Langenieux, of Rheims; Archbishop Ledochowski, of Posen; the Marquis Cosmegnolles, the Right Rev. Dr. Moran of Sydney, New South Wales, and Monsignor Sabatucci, Capocelatro, Battaglini and Cricolari.

Steed of Grief Over her Husband's Death.

HOOPESTON, Ill., July 1.—Mrs. Lucy Grier, aged 79, had lived alone with his wife in the town of Danforth for five years. He died on the 15th inst. His widow, who had never been ill a day, was so grief stricken by his death that she pined visibly away, and was yesterday found dead in her room. She was 60 years of age.

An Elephant Crushes out a Circus.

LAPEER, Mich., June 24.—During the performance of a circus here yesterday, a large elephant became infuriated and turned upon the 1,000 persons assembled under the canvas. He tore up the seats, smashed the furniture, and made heavy assaults upon the canvas, which, however, held together and stopped followed. The enraged elephant, after clearing out the canvas made a break for the woods near by, and aimed himself in an adjacent swamp. After much difficulty he was extricated, but five buffalos were shot in the hide to tame him. Amid the panic a number of limbs were broken, but no property was lost and damaged. No fatalities occurred.

Number of Indians at the Custer Massacre.

WASHINGTON, June 24.—Major Reno, who took part in the campaign which ended in the Custer massacre, has long wished to know how many Indians participated in that affair. He has at last obtained that, which he says, and by means of an interpreter associated that there was probably from 5,000 to 6,000 Indians in the fight, a force strong enough to have easily overwhelmed Custer's and Major Reno's forces. Sitting Bull was not very willing to talk this details, so he has still no approximation that the whites may punish him for his part in the affair. Major Reno's figures in his official report, fixed the number of Indians at 3,000.

The Catholics and the Ritual Rebellion.

LONDON, June 24.—A correspondent of the Catholic Standard, writing from Rome, says he was told by the clergy of the Roman Catholic Church, that Mr. Gladstone has denounced the ritualistic movement in the Church of England, and that his grace, the venerable Archbishop of Westminster, has sent his sympathy to the ritualistic remained firm in their allegiance to the Queen and opposed their persons to the violent of the bloodthirsty Indians, and died at their posts in endeavoring to restrain the murderous fanatics of savages, should forever silence such calumnies. These men did not flee for safety to the other settlements, nor even betake themselves to the forts for protection, but died like brave men at the post of duty. Such a statement in a reputable Protestant religious organ is a damn-red rebuke to those Catholic people who are always on the lookout for a fight over religion.—N. Y. Tribune.

CATHOLIC KNIGHTS OF AMERICA.

Pen-Portraits of the Supreme Officers.

A correspondent of the New Orleans Morning Star furnishes that journal with the following sketches of the Supreme officers recently elected by the Supreme Council of the Catholic Knights of America:

I herewith submit my impressions in reference to the supreme officers of the Catholic Knights of America, based upon the acquaintance which I formed during the last biennial session of the Supreme Council.

SUPREME PRESIDENT, R. A. SIDNEY.

The Supreme President, who was unanimously elected on two ballots, is tall and slender, with hair and beard well streaked with gray, speaks with deliberation and is always dignified and gentlemanly in manner; is a lawyer in practice, is his native State of Kentucky, and has devoted himself, heart and soul, to the interest of managing the manifold and complicated business affairs of the Order, which, under his wise and able guidance, has assumed a foremost position among Catholic beneficial associations. Of Presidential Brosnan it is enough to say, that he is the right man in the right place.

THE AUDITOR FOR PRESIDENT'S BUSINESS, is tall and commanding in appearance, and is possessed of considerable ability. He was a leading part in the debates had in the Supreme Council, and has a genuine sympathy and acquaintance with the poor, moneyless friends, who represent the great mass of the membership of the Order.

JOHN BASS,

who was deservedly re-elected Supreme Secretary, is eminently qualified for the position. He is of medium stature, nearly approaching stout, growing gray and dark hair, and is partially bald. His distinct articulation and earnest address were appreciated by the members of the Council, who listened to his calling the roll, reading the minutes, and performing the other duties devolving upon him as secretary. By his amiable, courteous demeanor to all, who had occasion to transact business in regard to the work of his office, he won the esteem of each and every one.

R. J. GAGNE,

Unlike Brother Bass, who is not a speaker, is an eloquent orator, and a ready debater. Brother Gagne, M. J. Gillson, of Tennessee, is both a graceful and polished orator, and a ready and painstaking official. He is apparently about 35 years of age, and the handsomest of the supreme officers. His size, is of medium height, but well proportioned, is a fair complexion and wears a moustache, will become him. His management of the Supreme Chair of the Order during the term of office, has—to a satisfactory that the Supreme Council of Knights has been able to discount the ninety days' term fixed for the payment of death benefits, by sending payment of such benefits in sixty days.

OF THE SUPREME GUARDIAN, PETERSEN,

Duffy of Tennessee, Frontage of Indiana and Swartz of Illinois, it will be sufficient to say, that better selections could scarcely have been made. Brother Duffy has been re-elected to the office which they now hold, while Brother Swartz of St. Louis, is a new, but excellent addition to the Board of Supreme Trustees. It was due to the State of Illinois, which has the largest membership in both Knights of Honor and Knights of Columbus, that the Committee should be given it in the line of Supreme Officers.

I hope that the eleventh, imperfect though it be, will be acceptable to the members of the Catholic Knights of America among your readers, as well as to the general public.

To most children the bare suggestion of a dose is cause of an outcry. Why not let them enjoy it instead? for Hollos Syrup can be obtained the world over. Its taste is so pleasant, its effects so gentle and beneficial, and being sugar coated it is easily taken.

LETTER FROM MARYSVILLE.

Closing Exercises of the Parochial School—Grand Success of the Brothers of Mary—Value of Catholic Education, etc.

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR—

Dear Sir—In my last communication to your invaluable Catholic journal, I merely mentioned "en passant" that the vacation and closing exercises of St. Joseph's Parochial School, under the direction of the Brothers of Mary, would come off on the last day of June, and I now propose to give your readers a few lines on those happy closing days, which, in my humble opinion, rather of a second Christian Jubilee, which took place on the morning of the 24th inst.

At 9 o'clock a.m., immediately upon throwing open the door that led to the hall, a rush was made for the seats that commanded a favorable view of the beautiful platform, and in less time that it takes to describe it, every available spot was occupied. A large number being unable to gain admittance either sauntered through the spacious play grounds or in disguised retreats discovered some sought the shelter of their own respective homes, but all were unanimous in their expressions of admiration and the harmony of the whole showed that a master mind had designed and executed them. The programme was particularly interesting and carried out to the fullest letter of the law.

The exercises opened with a directing Hymn Chorus that was well rendered, showing that the cultivation of the voices of our youths a careful training on the part of the Brothers. Next was a recitation by the little orator, Willie Ward, who acquitted himself in a creditable manner, and was followed by a Sacred Duet by Master Willie Ward and the standard-bearer, Charles Dorrigan, and I must confess, I thought I heard a more throughs one, nor seen an evidence of greater proficiency considering that the boys are in charge only ten months. Immediately after this, Brother Lionger rattled through a dialogue by an amusing dagger on the black board, and so pleasantly and manfully did the youths acquit themselves that old grammarians who claimed to be old medicals were almost thrown into black heaping was next in order, trial balance, and the boys showed that they were able to stand to find the lowest weight, and, here I must be young lads, who stood at the blackboard, never one a dim of solution making for correct answer, another point. A spelling match, as old-fashioned spelling match, was next on the tapis, in which all were deeply interested. The contest was hot and excitement grew to a fever heat, when one by one the great-tallen contestants had to retire to a back seat, and one alone, a boy son of a brave father, young Peter Delay, stood like a towering pine in the mountains, covered in all his well-earned glory. Now after this exercise came the 'tug of war' between the pupils of Algebra. In close and hot-enough combinations, the boys showed a most accurate and intimate knowledge of the fundamental principles of that most accurate and useful Science. A problem was given by Brother John Superior containing two subtrahend quantities, which was fully demonstrated, and in a manner that extended a manner to be win from all present the highest commendation. Reading by boys of the juvenile class was next in order, and to my mind, it was the most pleasing of all. Brother Brother Brendan's pupils read with ease and understanding, and in a manner that showed teaching and intelligent instruction. Then comes the reading of the boys of the second class, and here, as in many other things, the careful and efficient training of the teachers was plainly recognized. What I admired most was the intimate knowledge shown by the pupils of their own County and State. It is well to begin at home. Geographical things, under the direction of Brother John, was the crowning gem of the whole morning's examination. He took the displayed thorough knowledge of that portion of the globe, and, in a manner, that showed a thoroughness, that might prove to be such a gem. The furness given was so tiptop, so well-timed, so well-directed, so thoroughly so, through three great points. And the expedition with which this last exercise was carried out would do credit to a first-class university. All these different exercises were varied and interspersed with choruses, dialogues and duets. Between the exercises of Hymns, Music, Poetry and grammar, came the moral chorus "O Heart of Mary." Its sweet melodious and appropriate accompaniment should be given to the Sisters of Mary, the Third Spanish. After the spelling match, the Brothers of Mary, in a few well-chosen and numbering some twenty and odd, acted their parts so gracefully, and playing so naturally the shifting of scene, each boy comes and every time passed off little fun, to more amusing instrument known to music-lore, and keeping such perfect time with the rhythm of a piece were to follow the impression made, you would actually imagine yourself in the presence of some orchestra moved by some invisible power. Such perfect time in all the exercises of the day was rendered in fan style and between the whole "O Heart of Mary." Such a chorus was well rendered chorus, "On the Mountains." Such a chorus was well rendered, "On the Mountains." Such a chorus was well rendered, and rich enjoyment in the comedy of the "Dancing Master

"YE DID IT UNTO ME"

EATHERINE E. CONRAT.

We read the sad, sweet story of the life of Christ so earth,
And anxious thoughts crowd thick and fast, "Ah Lord, Thou'd habit so death
Of all our joys and pain! Thou had early so been thyre!
Our home, our hearts, our labor's fruit—what joy with Thee to share."

We read the sad, sweet story — "Whate'er ye do" (saith He)
"To the least of these my little ones, ye do it unto me."
But so somehow mine is meaning, and somehow we are Thus, in the homeless little ones, Christ walks among us.

In them He suffers hunger, in them He is a stranger,
In them is cold and shelterless, astray in by way, danger,
Shall we go peaceful, happy, nor fear a talent of sin,
While we ope no door in pity to let the Christ Child in?

Go, spread your wings, sweet angel, bright message from Heaven!
Go, whisper unto every heart, the gracious promise given;
Christ pleads not by honors, world-lauded or golden glory,
List to the wondrous warning of the olden Gospel Story:

What time ye stand before Him in the awful judgment day
When Earth and Heaven, fire-tried, like a scroll rolled away
They pass, but His remained, and this your text shall be,
"As ye did unto the least of mine, so did ye unto Me."

DOLORES;

Where I Found Her, and How She Became My Guest.

It was getting dusk and I could hear the church clock striking across the water, six o'clock. There were still light streaks of red and bars of light in the western sky, and the sea was calm, with a white crinkle upon it. I was country born, young and strong, and I knew no fear, though the road was lonely and there had been such tales in the villages of gypsies and tramps, and the passengers in the coach coming from London had been robbed not so many weeks ago. I was taking a long step across the country and Tiger and I hurried home, now thinking (at least, I thought, and Tiger was the most sympathetic of dogs) that before he should strain the ball hour we should be sitting comfortably by the fire side.

The path run for some little distance close to the Black Pond; the hills rose steep on either side of it; here and there was a cluster of bushes, here and there a tree hung over the deep water. In the fast fading twilight I could still see the reflections sharp and clear. I was so close to the water that I would watch the little ripples on its surface. The path was muddy in places; I picked my way cautiously from one dry spot to another. Tiger was a few yards in front of me. Suddenly he growled and dashed forward with a bound. "Tiger, Tiger! I called, and even at the same moment I rather felt than saw that a dark figure was standing in front of me—moving swiftly, noiselessly, away from me, under the shadow of the bushes. "Who is there?"

No answer, only Tiger turned suddenly and sank back to my side. There were stories swift flying about the place of a young woman who had lost her child, a couple, I was said that the body of the child, a couple been found. Something I had seen, and Tiger had seen it, too. Could it be the ghost of the luckless mind? A low moaning sound fell on my ear; horror stricken, I turned and fled. I ran the hill as fast as my feet could carry me. But I did not run far. "What is this?" I asked my better self. "Pluck Lynscombe, will you, the daughter of a brave soldier who died for your country, the wife of as true a sailor as ever sailed in the King's fleet—will you run away and fly in a panic? Return, and see if you can help any fellow creature in misery. Return and face the danger, and God be with you.

Some such thoughts ran through my brain. I was always one to act on impulse, and I turned my steps, walking with a bold front and beating heart, straight in the direction of the shadow. I could see it now again, a tall figure—a woman's figure—in a long cloak. Once it stopped and hid itself beneath a tree; next time I passed by had not Tiger growled and shown his teeth. "Who are you?" I called in desperation—"I tell ye. Are you ill! Can I help you?"

Then in the silence of the evening it crept out of the darkness and glided quickly towards the edge, the very edge, of the pond.

"Take care!" I shouted, "the water is deep!"

For an answer it flung off the cloak, threw up its arms and plunged into the pond. I had seen a white face, I had seen a hat of a white face, the face of a beautiful woman, her black hair streaming around her; and then I rushed to the water's edge, unable myself with horror. It was then a wife from the village. I could get no further—it was vain to scream. By good luck the moon was out, and now the hedges were yellow to me! and as I raised my hand he sprang after the woman. I was spread his breaches for over the pond at this point. I crawled along a bough as far as it would bear me, and so hanging over the water managed to gain a firm hold of her dress. By Heaven's mercy the pond was not at very deep at this spot; I do not think that she was even fairly out of her depth, and she had not lost consciousness. How we did it I cannot exactly tell you, but between—Tiger and me—we got her out, shivering but alive, on the bank—moaning and wringing her hands, but alive and, as far as I could see, unhurt. There was no time to question her. I made go home—to the warm fireside, and take her with me. "Come," I said, holding her hand tight in mine, "come." She lifted her eyes and looked at me—they were wild with terror her lips moved, but she spoke in a strange tongue that I could not understand.

I took up the cloak that lay on the ground and wrapped it round her, taking care that her face was turned away from the pond. I went my way very slowly, half dragging her up the bank, and over and among the stones, stopped to gasp for breath and to ask and moan. Half-past six struck, and seven struck before we reached the garden gate, with Tiger and I we drew the front, to warn the housekeeper, was there watching for me. She is a discreet woman; I know I could trust her. "There has been an accident; help me to take the lady in," I said.

Miriam ceased no more, she put her arm around the lady and carried her, fainting, to her own room. We got her into bed—off, Miriam lighted the fire and made a hot posset from my grandfather's recipe, and little by little the strange came to herself and opened her eyes, again with the wild stare that I had seen before. "Give thanks! I was to be so far from the terrible pond!

"Senora," she said, trying to sit up, "I will intreats no more—I will depart."

I answered her that she was too weak to think of departing, that she was a welcome guest; that she must sleep now, and to morrow we would converse further.

"As you will, Senora," she replied; "I owe all to you, I kiss your hand." And as her hand fell back on the pillow, and she could speak no more for very weariness. A few moments later and she was fast asleep, with her dark lashes resting on her cheek. Her hands were clasped together as if she were praying; I noticed that they were white and beautifully formed; on one of them she wore a red gold ring. How did she come to wander alone by the Black Pond? Who was she? Whence did she come? I felt so thankful—oh! very thankful—that I had been there to help her at that critical moment. The tears sprang to my eyes as I stopped and kissed her. Miriam was my one friend who was with my mother as a girl, and lived with me during my holidays and school-days. Miriam was my own home, my mother's home, and I was a long orphan. She persuaded me to change my wet palisse, she combed and brushed my hair, and reasoned me about the strange lady. Not till then did I know how very tired I was.

My visitor passed a restless night; for days she lay in a fever, shivering and talking fast. Now and then she broke out into broken English, asking for a certain Captain Charles Walters over and over again. He had lodgings at Plymouth, it would seem and she could not find the house. Miriam is as clever a nurse as she is a good housekeeper, and she, nursed the lady with the greatest care. By degrees our patient recovered without the aid of a doctor, who treated a good ten miles off rule across the country, and of whose skill Miriam had no opinion. But she had many simple remedies of her own, and these she used, and she made dainty dishes and cooling draughts, and at last there came a day when the lady sat by the hearth, with a hot toast of color on her cheek, and then she said to her nurse, in a low voice, and with tears in her eyes, "Dolores de Rioso; she was a Spaniard born (as I had guessed), an orphan, and she had been wooed and won by an English officer whose ship lay at anchor in the port of Barcelona, lived by the house where she lived with an uncle. (I, too, took an interest in Barcelona, as my husband had described the place to me in his letters.) This officer had married Dolores secretly; his ship had sailed, and he left her with the wedding ring, which she showed me, and her marriage lines, and a slip of paper—"Lieutenant Walters, 16 Hollow Terrace, Plymouth." And there she was to join him as soon as he should send for her. For a whole year she had no tidings from him, then she took her passage to Plymouth in a merchant-ship. They had a miserable passage, being delayed on the voyage by adverse winds. She had finally reached Plymouth with a few gold pieces in her purse, friendless and alone. She had asked in vain for Mr. Hollow Terrace; no one knew of such a street, or indeed of the existence of her husband, Lieutenant Charles Walters. After a week her purse was nearly empty. She knew not where to turn for help; at last she thought to find her husband in London, and as she could not pay for a coach she had to walk all those many miles. Then as she passed the Black Pond that evening, faint and suffering, she could no longer endure the misery of suspense, and had rushed into the water, filled with a frantic longing to be at rest.

Having told her story with many tears, she called upon the holy saints to bear witness to her good faith. Tiger was a few yards in front of me. Suddenly he growled and dashed forward with a bound. "Tiger, Tiger! I called, and even at the same moment I rather felt than saw that a dark figure was standing in front of me—moving swiftly, noiselessly, away from me, under the shadow of the bushes. "Who is there?"

No answer, only Tiger turned suddenly and sank back to my side. There were stories swift flying about the place of a young woman who had lost her child, a couple, I was said that the body of the child, a couple been found. Something I had seen, and Tiger had seen it, too. Could it be the ghost of the luckless mind? A low moaning sound fell on my ear; horror stricken, I turned and fled. I ran the hill as fast as my feet could carry me. But I did not run far. "What is this?" asked my better self. "Pluck Lynscombe, will you, the daughter of a brave soldier who died for your country, the wife of as true a sailor as ever sailed in the King's fleet—will you run away and fly in a panic! Return, and see if you can help any fellow creature in misery. Return and face the danger, and God be with you.

Some such thoughts ran through my brain. I was always one to act on impulse, and I turned my steps, walking with a bold front and beating heart, straight in the direction of the shadow. I could see it now again, a tall figure—a woman's figure—in a long cloak. Once it stopped and hid itself beneath a tree; next time I passed by had not Tiger growled and shown his teeth. "Who are you?" I called in desperation—"I tell ye. Are you ill! Can I help you?"

Then in the silence of the evening it crept out of the darkness and glided quickly towards the edge, the very edge, of the pond.

THE IRISH JAUNTING CAR.

Anecdotes of the Irish Jarvys.

One of the first sights I saw on my arrival in Dublin was a strike, the strangest from the side of St. George's Channel on a visit to Dublin. At the "outside" of the Irish jaunting car I am no longer one to the green isle. I have met it no more, alas, except in pictures, for it cannot have been introduced by the Irish merchant drivers engaged in this new trade, and on the shores of the Alexandra Docks. It is a low, long, open vehicle, with a small driver's seat in front, a space, called the well immediately behind, where the luggage is stowed, and then rows of well passengers' seats, back to back, which seats can be turned up like flaps when not used. The driver near occupies his proper perch unless when he has full complement of four fares, he prefers to sit on one of the side seats, and the passenger then is sometimes called a side car, left or right is immaterial. There are plenty of four-wheelers in the Irish capital, but the attempt to naturalize the famous there national car is generally a failure. The explanation is simple. The tariff of charges for "car fares" has to be a drive from one point within the municipal boundaries, or Circular Road, to another is a sixpence between 7 a. m. and 10 p. m., one shilling in the night hours. That is for two passengers, the "jarvey" (coachman) allowing for passengers he was expected to carry pay. As Pat is generally the "jarvey" himself, he sometimes sets up the "outside," but he could not pay a penny for it—without police difficulties, so he has to be honest. He is honest fellow, generally.

Washington Irving says somewhere that the taste for street-sleeping is common in Ireland. So that the jaunting car is a home. It is the breakest, rhapsest, and most reckless vehicle ever invented, and I have yet to meet as if you were on a hard-trotting horse which might be run down at any moment, for the counterweight of an occasional pair in the "jarvey" seat, and you went to sing a song about Queen Victoria's experiences on a "road" about Balbriggan, which I must so ireland. The sum of it was that her Majesty "liked the jaunting of an Irish jaunting car." A Irish Prince Napoleon liked it, for on a trip to Ireland in 1857 he "came away as a mountain jaunting car." the imperial patch, Le Roux Horsemen. Mr. Thackeray Irish Sketch Book, Mr. Arnaw on an outsider, was nightly pleased with his experiences. The same tale has lived as much at home as if he were in the lap of Hooey.

Pat is, say, six hundred and seventy nine distinct anecdotes of which Larry Doolan is the hero. Larry as he himself tells one of these are remarkable from a hour antiquity to within five generations back. It is more merciful to fight shy of stale Joe Miller jokes and to give a few of the latest experiences for something new. To carry out this intention honestly, I ask permission to begin with one which I know to be true, which is a very good that it will bear being twice told.

There is an annual festivity in the Hibernian Hall, Dublin, known as the Jaunting Hall. A couple of subalterns quartered at the Castle, accompanied by their wives, were asking Dolores, but as I became the wood-a fifth chair, with six exaggerated top for himself, drawn in from their houses, the doors and windows, and drove like John, the Scotch Queen, to the Hibernian Hall gate, one of the passengers told him that he was a fool, and that he would get a shilling, his strictly legal fare. The Irishman said he would, and he presented a washerwoman the Chief Secretary, "Sir Hugh," said the Irishman, "I'm a man of my word, and I'm not tell you the whole story of the ring now, dearest Phoebe; it belongs to my brother Charlotte, he is at Plymouth; to-morrow you shall hear all about it."

Pat said that Charlotte's friends and unbelievers had long been a cause of annoyance to Phoebe, who had been married out and best beloved brother, so I forgave to grieve him with another word on the subject.

"Is that our good Mirram at the door? asked Ambrose, pointing to a white cat tainly a step in the passage, but when I opened the door Miriam I found her in her room at the farther end of the house. Afterward I remembered that she must have passed along the hedge and gone out at the garden gate, but at that time I took no notice of the circumstance. When the supper had ended, I asked Ambrose how long could be. It was long past her usual hour for retorting. At last I sent a maid to the passage bidding her to hasten home. Alas! she had left an hour ago. We searching all through the house, in the garden and the paddock it grew dark, and I could no longer conceal my distress. Ambrose, too looked grave. He went with the maid home, and they made inquiries in the village (they even walked as far as the Black Pond, but they found no trace of Dolores.

There was nothing now to be done; we could but wait for the morning, when my brother-in-law, who was in lodgings in Plymouth, end sent out mounted messengers to scour the country; she could not be far off.

Very early the next day a little piece of paper was delivered to me. With difficulty I deciphered the words that were written in pencil: "Hear and honored Senora—Do not seek to find me. I shall never return to Hollow Terrace, for I have left with my free will. Ever and ever will I pray for you, your devoted and grateful servant, I kiss your hands and your feet. Dolores de Rioso Walters."

Ambrose was always a man of few words. He made no comment on the letter. Very shortly he bade me a loving farewell, and he took his leave. I spent the day alone, hoping for the return of Dolores. Ambrose, on his myself, Ambrose, on one of the mer, must find her soon—she could not well far, and there was no one to be hired in the village save if she had had the means to engage one, and I knew how strongly were I to contend with her power. Why had she left me? Was her brain unhinged by her sorrows? Would she agree to put an end to her life? Late in the afternoon I wrapped a mantle round me and went out to breathe the air. Perhaps I should meet one of the party and hear the news that I dreaded, and yet longed to hear. The gorse hedge at the end of the garden, growing close to the ground, I passed (the bed by the sandial was red and blue with flowering lysanthis; the forms so every ditch and in every stone wall were peeping forth their brown and green pennons the air was full of the sounds of spring. Tiger was bounding in the sun by the gate, "Tiger" I cried, struck with a new idea, "find her, good dog. Seek Dolores!" He looked at me as if he understood me; once he fetched a scarf of hers and held it up to me. Whatever more all he set off down the lane, and took a short cut across a field and disappeared in a wood. Every now and then he stopped and looked my hand as I followed him. He was warm and sheltered in the pine wood the ground was slippery with fir needles. The dog ran on, and I found a pile of fagots he was stacked against a low stone wall. He stood with one side of his face rubbed in soft. Here the earth was carpeted with moss. I stepped noiselessly across the open space, thinking to climb the wall and look down into the lane

THE MONITOR.

TWENTY-EIGHTH YEAR OF PUBLICATION.

THE MONITOR has the largest circulation of any Religious Paper published on the Pacific Coast.

WEDNESDAY JULY 15, 1885.

MISSION OF THE CATHOLIC PRESS.

"Journalism is the greatest social power, because it is the chief agent in popularizing issues, and gives actual form to abstract principles and opinions governing the world. In our age, religious journalism is actually the most powerful moral agency, and it is the duty of every responsible to his creed, or liberty, to work in open battle. What is and what ought to be the subject of Catholic journalism but to establish creed and defend the truth, whatever it may be—assert all, the Divine truth—and deny all, the human falsehood?

"Man does not live upon abstract principles, but on facts. In the Catholic Church, every where, protection lies, which is to be placed, one writers of Catholic journals who defend the cause of religion, the rights and those of Holy Church, are the best friends of the Christian and peaceable and Society.—Pius IX.

Editorial Notes.

—Among the deserving students of the Law Department of Georgetown University upon whom the Degree of Master of Laws was conferred at the recent commencement, we notice the name of George O'Doherty of California.

—We print a very interesting letter from our patriotic Irish correspondent this week, who mentions—among other gratifying news—the fact that several Irish members of Parliament contemplate a visit to this land in a few months.

—Referring to the unveiling, on Saturday last, of the monument to Cardinal Monichal in the Church of St. Onofrio, Rome, the Monitor de Rome says: "It is now know that Cardinal Mermillod spoke as he lamented and daily thirty-five languages, and fifty-four dialects."

—It is stated that the Rev. Dr. Dulany, S. J., President of the Catholic University College, Dublin, has been nominated by the Crown to the vacancy on the Senate of the Royal University, occasioned by the death of Cardinal MacCabe. The Rev. Dr. Dulany is a distinguished member of the Jesuit Order, and has had a long experience as an educationist, having been formerly Rector of Tullabeg College.

—Cardinal Lavigerie, who left Algiers two months ago to plead the cause of the African Church in his native France, passed through Turin a few days ago on his way to Rome. He paid a visit to Don Bosco, being anxious to secure the services of the Salesian Missionaries for his large diocese. The emigrants founded by Don Bosco already bids fair to become one of the grandest Evangelizing agencies in the Catholic Church.

—The masterly controversial discourse which we publish on the first page this week, under the title. "Are all Religious True?" should be carefully read by all Christians in the land, as it effectually fastens out Dr. Stebbins' falsehood concerning the most vital subject that can attract the attention of all thinking men. Read it, Catholics, then pass the paper to your non-Catholic neighbors.

—A ragged and broken down old man was brought up before a police court in Chicago, recently, on a charge of sending postage stamps off mail matter left on the top of street mail boxes. He was William Drummond, formerly a brilliant lawyer, and at one time Chief Justice of Cuba. Drink brought him to degradation and crime. When asked why he had stolen the stamps, he said in a husky voice, "I was dying for a drink!"

—We congratulate our good friend, Father Clark of the Catholic Columbian, in having secured the able editorial assistance of Mr. L. W. Reilly, formerly editor of the Baltimore Catholic Mirror. Mr. Reilly is not only a good writer but a trained journalist whose services will indeed be valuable to Father Clark, as the latter seslous priest has a higher mission than that which falls to the lot of ordinary mortals.

—We hope all our readers in this vicinity will be present on the Mission Hill and bear in mind that at 3 o'clock next Sunday his Grace Archbishop Riordan will lay the corner-stone of St. Anthony's Church, Brooklyn, Alameda county. The trip across the bay and the pleasant ride in the Oakland cars will prove a very acceptable afternoon's enjoyment to all who participate. Besides they will have the delight of seeing another splendid church commenced in God's honor, and of listening to an instructive discourse from Rev. R. Newell, O. P., as well as having a share in the blessing which Almighty God bestows upon those who help to erect sanctuaries to the Most High. We hope to see at least ten thousand friends of Father Gleason assemble round him on that auspicious occasion.

—A touching story is told of the Vanerable Bede's completion of his translation of the Gospel of St. John into Saxon in the monastery of Jarrow-on-the-Tyne. When the last chapter was reached, the scribe, seeing that his master's strength was failing, said: "It seems difficult for you to speak." "Nay, it is easy," replied Bede; "take your pen, dip it in ink, and write as fast as you can." "Now, master," said the scribe, "only one sentence is wanting." Bede repeated it. "It is finished," said the scribe. "It is finished," replied the dying servant of God; "lift up my head: fat me sit in my cell, in the place where I have been accustomed to pray . and now, 'Glory be to the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost.'" With these words Bede's spirit went up to God.

—In a marked copy of the Tripe County Register which came to hand this week, we find the following

There are many Catholic families and individuals in this valley. Parents, true lovers of their faith, are growing anxious near the fact that their children are growing up in total ignorance of the teachings due unto of such great, or most in the church. Some of these ask us to call attention to these facts that through some early action by superiors of the faith, a priest may be sent here to permanently work and reside. We are assured he will receive all sufficient support, and we know he will be met with the cordial and minding across faith, a reasonable circuit. Let these concerns take heed.

The proper way to procure a priest is for Catholics to address a respectful request to their Bishop. Priests are not the property of printing offices, nor are non-Catholic newspapers the proper medium for such requests. Let an approximate census of Impensanty Catholics be made; let each head of a family signify how much he or she will give towards the support of a priest, forward the document to the Bishop of the diocese, and action in the matter will be taken instantly if there is a priest to spare. The most "concerned" people in such matters are Catholic parents, and they should "take heed" how they transgress the duty of respect due to the Prelate set over them and who are ever ready to respond to any request couched in the language of a Catholic Bishop from a respectful Catholic —A correspondent of the Pacific alludes to a letter from Mexico which was printed in a city paper, and in which were some absurd allusions to the Blessed Virgin, hence the Pacific's correspondent concludes that the communications emanated from a Catholic. For the enlightenment of our friends of the Pacific and its correspondent, we deem it proper to inform that the writer of the report in question is Fannie B. Ward, who raises the Mother of God nearly as blasphemous as Rev. McCrary. So far from being a Catholic, she is one of those puffed-up prudes who think themselves too good to acknowledge their inferiority to Almighty God. Hence they hate to hear the praises of the Blessed Virgin mentioned, and they purposely malign her whenever an opportunity offers. Mary is not "substituted for Jesus in the Catholic Church," nor can the Pacific's correspondent say so from any reputable authentic source.

"Catholic Children should be Educated in Catholic Schools!"

Such was the impressive and important precept promulgated by Archbishop Riordan in the course of his sermon in St. Mary's Cathedral on last Sunday, and now that the Catholic schools throughout this Archdiocese are about resuming studies, this mandate should be put into practical operation by every Catholic parent who has any reverence or respect for the religion he professes or for the soul-saving admonitions of that Prelate, whom the voice of God has called to preside over His Church in this Archdiocese.

We are told by the Church that "without faith it is impossible to please God," and how can Catholic parents reconcile their conscience when they send their children to schools where Catholic faith is scoffed at, where Catholic principles are ignored, and where the main facts of history are malignant slanders upon the Saints and Pontiffs of the Church of God?

Almighty God has imposed a fearful responsibility upon Catholic parents in this regard. He has sent them children for the salvation of whose souls they alone are responsible. And how is it possible to preserve that priceless gift of Catholic faith without Catholic education? There are thousands of Catholic parents in this land who seem to glory in turning their children away from God by sending them into the terrible temptations to apostacy which beset them in sectarian Sunday-schools and godless public schools where they will grow up in ignorance of even the elementary principles of Catholic faith. Such parents will have a terrible account to give to Almighty God for the loss of the souls of those sinless children whom God sent them in order that they might become cohers of the kingdom of heaven. There is only one way in which the will of God can be carried out in this regard, and that is by obeying the behests of our beloved Archbishop when he tells us that "CATHOLIC CHILDREN SHOULD BE EDUCATED IN CATHOLIC SCHOOLS." Hearken to the voice of your Prelate, ye wise Catholics, and let no worldly considerations cause you to suffer the loss of a single soul among your children. Wise is that parent who hears the Church through the voice of his Bishop, and blessed in the sight of God is that Catholic parent who preserves in the soul of his child the holy faith he inherited from his fathers.

A Singular Superstition.

A great many people ignorantly imagine that superstition is confined altogether to Catholics, and is particularly the national weakness of the Irish people, yet the truth is that every nation has its own peculiar superstitions, nor are the American people free from such mental illusions—as the following items quoted from a Pennsylvania paper go far to prove.

It appears that on a recent occasion Mr. Abram Heed, a farmer living in Beaver township, Pa., cut down a large oak tree on his farm, and in cutting it up he found, embedded in the trunk, seven or eight feet from the ground, a small glass bottle and what had the appearance of a lock of hair. The bottle had been inserted in a hole in the tree made by an auger, than a plug was driven into the hole over the bottle, the hair also being held in the hole by the plug. The bottle was corked, and contained a colorless liquid. Over the plug had grown six solid rings of wood, besides a thick bark. There was a superstition among the early settlers, and it is held by many of their descendants, that asthma and other affections could be cured by the victim standing against the tree and having a lock of his hair plugged in it while the hair was still attached to his head. It must then be cut off close to his head, and the afflicted person walk away without looking at it or ever going by the tree again. While the use of a bottle was not included in the treatment, it is believed that the one with the hair discovered in the heart of the oak tree was put there in the early days of the settlement by some believer in the superstition to cure an ailment of some kind.

The Society of St. Vincent de Paul

Has of the most useful, edifying and fruitful associations in which the Catholic laity are privileged to participate is the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, an association that has won the admiration of Popes and Prelates for the munificence of its charity and the edifying example which it has set before the world in its silent ministrations to the deserving poor.

Many Pontiffs have recommended this society as well worthy the support and personal interest of Catholics, but the Highest Pontiff of our Holy Faith has crowned its labors in the most emphatic by our present wise and holy Pope, who, in his encyclical Encyclical Letter issued April 20th, 1884, thus recommends its progress throughout every portion of the world called over by the Prince of Peace. In the Encyclical Letter in question, Pope Leo XIII. says

"We cannot here in silence pass over our society which has given so many admirable examples, and which has deserved so well of the lower classes. We speak of the society which took the name of its father, St. Vincent de Paul. The work it has done, and the object it sets before itself, are sufficiently well known. The affects of its members, prompted by charity, are solely directed to the relief of the poor and distressed—a work which they carry out with wonderful wisdom, and a modesty so rare. But the more this society conceals the good it effects, the more it is fitted to the practice of charity and the alleviation of mankind's miseries."

The charter of a century ago nearly every parish then existing in this city had its St. Vincent de Paul Conference, but the suburban parishes, numerous or defection of members, caused the organization to degenerate to such an extent that it survived in but a few parishes. Seeing the necessity that existed for reviving again this useful charitable organization, and inspired by the precept of the Sovereign Pontiff, our beloved Archbishop has expressed his desire to see a Conference of St. Vincent de Paul instituted in every parish in this city, so that the needs of the deserving poor may be systematically relieved.

In accordance with the decree of Rome, Conferences have already been organized in the Cathedral parish, and in many other parishes throughout the city, and we understand that it is the intention of the Archbishop to convene a general meeting of all the Conferences on some day in the feast of St. Vincent de Paul, which occurs on the 19th inst., by which time it is hoped that the organization will be represented by a Conference in every parish in the city.

All such corporal works of mercy as those in which the members of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul are engaged, can never fail of being blessed by God, and the proper unless they have the pure love of God for their foundation. And how can this be secured? Simply by every member set them in sectarian Sunday-schools, the godless public schools where they will grow up in ignorance of even the elementary principles of Catholic faith. Such parents will have a terrible account to give to Almighty God for the loss of the souls of those sinless children whom God sent them in order that they might become cohers of the kingdom of heaven. There is only one way in which the will of God can be carried out in this regard, and that is by obeying the behests of our beloved Archbishop when he tells us that "CATHOLIC CHILDREN SHOULD BE EDUCATED IN CATHOLIC SCHOOLS." Hearken to the voice of your Prelate, ye wise Catholics, and let no worldly considerations cause you to suffer the loss of a single soul among your children. Wise is that parent who hears the Church through the voice of his Bishop, and blessed in the sight of God is that Catholic parent who preserves in the soul of his child the holy faith he inherited from his fathers.

The Catholic Church in Utah.

People at a distance from the land of the "Latter Day Saints," have on the whole but a poor idea of the rapid growth of the Catholic Church in the Territory of Utah. Rev. Patrick Scanlan was almost the first priest who—with the true spirit of an Apostle—left the sunny land of the Pacific slope to pitch his tent and unfurl the flag of our holy religion right in the hotbed of Mormonism. How himself and his handful of coadjutors have rallied themselves for their work, and how Mr. Himself has helped that work, may not be—at least should not be—without interest to every Catholic.

Some ten or twelve years ago Father Scanlan arrived on this coast from the Island of Sainta—his native land. He was ordained for the Archdiocese of San Francisco in the Missionary College of All Hallows. His courage and zeal were put to the test soon after his arrival, but both were found equal to the occasion, and he proved to be most practical way, in accepting the Utah mission. Father Scanlan devoted to be no feather bed soldier of Jesus Christ. He started immediately for his field of labor and say more than that he spent there was a small pittance. Salt Lake City, he saw that perhaps for many years to come none but God alone could know anything of his whereabouts. After his arrival in Salt Lake he soon saw that some time must pass before he could hope to have anything worthy of occupying his time. Such a time instinct for duty, and taking things in the only way in which it was possible for them to succeed, he started south towards Pioche and Silver Reef to work among the poor, led by honest and faithful miners, many of whom were Irish. It was a God-send for these poor fellows, with hearts full of faith, to see a priest settle down among them, to labor for them, to direct and guide them was, no doubt, congenial to him who had made so many sacrifices for the Master whom he would no more see. The good Father settled down in their midst, built a church at Pioche, and a church and hospital at Silver Reef.

A true fatherly instinct has prompted the Rev. Father to follow the same course ever since. He will not be contented with tending to the wants of the dead, but he remembers that men are still in the flesh, and that to be a true follower of Him who came to pour balm into every wound, was to be nearly as good as a priest.

God alone knows what hardships and privations, what weariness and fatigue, what cold and even want he had to go through in carrying on his great projects. The grand success of the ten or twelve years labor of this zealous missionary are manifestations that will excite the wonder of those who himself is enjoying the reward of his faithfulness. A magnificent academy in Salt Lake City, a church in Ogden, a church in Mountains—in which about three hundred students are educated, was the result of the labors of this man of prudence. Next followed St. Mary's Hospital, standing on a splendid block of ten acres, the building itself worth about $100,000. Both these institutions, equipped as they are in splendid style, and managed by fifty Sisters of the Holy Cross, are the wonder of every stranger to Salt Lake.

We had nearly overlooked to mention what prompted this writing. We will remember, at this time last year, as will also all our readers, the total destruction of the church and schools by fire at Park City. No better proof can be had of the esteem in which both Priests and Sisters are held than the munificent liberality towards the church and schools of all classes of citizens on that occasion. Eight weeks from the time of the fire a magnificent convent, schools and church replaced those destroyed. The property was not of wood, but which now stands in its stead, and which was almost exclusively the work of the citizens, is of a solid character. The schools, in which are conducted by the same order of Sisters as those in Salt Lake, educate nearly two hundred children, and from what we have read in the Salt Lake City Tribune, and Park City Record, of their success and standing, we expect to see the greatest doubly increase next year. We give on the third page a short extract from the Record of the recent annual exhibition, to which we refer our readers.

Besides what we have already mentioned relative to the progress of the Catholic Church in Utah, we would mention the Catholics of Ogden now being built in Salt Lake City for logs, at a cost from $25,000 to $30,000. We have only one reason, to make in conclusion, and that is that no man knows how it is that so many fine institutions can come into the services of one man, and that in so short a time. Surely they do not labor in vain with Him Who is ever with them, and Who says they shall not be confounded.

The Head Trappist of Gethsemane.

It is singular with what avidity the secular press picks up every scandalous untruth concerning Catholic affairs, and plants all such slanders with the greatest of pomposity and displaying the most delicious delicacy. Why is this? It is simply because the depraved press, ever ready to receive sensational literature in order to satisfy the cravings of its immoral appetite, and any calumny against the Church or its priests is sure to find a listener who has to be rolled under the tongue of ten thousand untruthful tongues.

The editors of the secular press—in a great many instances at least, we hope—think that in ministering to public duty and unalignant scandal about Priests or Nuns, without making a single enquiry concerning their truth. This fact was well illustrated last Sunday week, when a daily paper located only a few blocks from St. Mary's Cathedral, published a flagrantly false account of the death of a Trappist monk, belonging to the monastery at Gethsemane, forty miles from Louisville, Kentucky. Ten minutes conference with any priest at the Cathedral would have enlightened a representative of the daily paper in question as to the untruthfulness of the printed account of the death of the monk in question, yet even that brief atom of time could not be devoted towards ascertaining the truth, but the calumny against this Catholic Order must be published to the world, and its good name smirched, because falsehood prevails over truth in the columns of the secular press.

The account published in our local contemporary gives a most exaggerated account of how this so-called "Runaway Monk" died and recovered ill treated to such an extent that he "escaped to a small chapel and sought shelter from a Protestant family, but was subsequently "forced into the Trappist monastery." Such a story after he was returned to the monastery.

The truth in this case makes the circumstances surrounding this monk's death very plain, and in order that their good name might not be tarnished by the bigotry of a new enemy of such Catholic institutions as the Trappist Monastery at Gethsemane, the attending physician of the Institution has published the following letter which every proves that the monk in question was imprisoned, was not starved, but on the contrary he received every attention that Christian kindness and regard from his brethren of the community, who furnished him with every requisite for his comfort and convenience. These facts are taken from a letter from the Rev. Father Pius, of the Abbey, not about three years ago he had to leave the Order on account of his mental incapacity, and during the last three years he was in charge of the Gethsemane Hospital, and for the last many years he has been suffering from a chronic nervous disease, which gives him paralysis agitans, which gives more or less great trouble, and which has made him a cripple for life. By the disease and his age, his mind is very much impaired, and he was troubled with hallucinations of various kinds, and he believed that he was persecuted by his brethren, firmly positively and emphatically he talks much of his persecution, but he says he knows anything to do with his whereabouts, and in many ways violated the rules of the Order, and was finally expelled.

As for his having been imprisoned or starved, or ill treated, he never received any of the ill-treatment. For several months he has been allowed to take his meals with the other fourteen feet, with a large window looking out on the garden, opposite door leading to a hall, in which the stairway leads to the first floor. He has been in this place last year, as will also with a twice sitting passing through the door of the refectory, and he has been allowed the liberty generally during the day. From this room he had free access to the garden, and could walk out from door, but always found the east of side door closed. He was free to leave the building if his contrary points was that he would go to the refectory, and he was not allowed to go by his better wishes to do so. Many of them, and the Superior, repeatedly begged and pleaded to leave his room and take outdoor exercise, but he refused, and he was not compelled to do so.

The Superior, he was in charge of the Infirmary, and for the last nearly years, he has been a monk for fifty-six years, and he is well known to the Catholic people of this country as a fervent religious. He is naturally very kind, and he is a man of great piety, and he is a man of great piety, and he is a man of great piety

How to Keep Husbands.

A contributor who writes under the nom de plume of "Susan Snap" speaks thus: "The other day the following sentence in a newspaper attracted my attention: 'It is easy enough to win a husband, but a pretty difficult thing to keep him.' Well, I said to myself, that all depends. Some, may be, are not worth the winning, but if they are, they are certainly worth keeping. But they are only mortal, and dreadfully mortal at that, and we must take them just as they are, not as we want them to be; and the woman who understands them knows they like to be petted and soothed—that there is something in their great, rough, earnest natures, that is touched by gentleness and pretty than by scolding, scan looks, and what is vulgarly called the 'logic of a broomhandle.'

They all have their weak points, even the best of them, and it will take some time to find them all out. But don't be discouraged; study them up and find a charm for every one. Perhaps he loves good dinner, eat; then charm him with sweet bread, fragrant coffee, delicious puddings, and other good things, and reach his heart through his stomach.' Does he like to look nice, and his proud of his locks? then let his shirts be fashions, the buttons always on, and don't forget to tell him how nice he looks when he goes with you he should go out to spend the evening, and be so entertaining generally that he will not wish to go away from home without you. Read aloud to him, while he rests in the easy chair or on the sofa; and if the reading basket is full invite him to read to you while you are then sing him the last new song. He will like it much better than 'dropping in a his shirt,' or going 'round the houses.' In be brilliant! then be amused at his bright speeches, and praise them. In be a disciple of Oscar Wilde, and does he pose, and is he too 'utterly utter' for anything? then I don't know what to tell you; but I guess he'll recover. (At any rate, I'd have him raise his own cuslowers; the seeds will do to heal the sickness.)

"In be of literary taste! then be literary enough to appreciate him. But if you chance to know more and know it, don't let he does, don't say anything, but keep it to yourself, for men like to be big and great to their wives. That's why a helpless-like woman, with fainting fits and a coaxing voice, could marry half a dozen times, while her strong, self-reliant sister walks through life single blessedness. So cultivate bright eyes and helplessness.

"In be naturally of a jealous disposition! then use all your power to teach him confidence. Dost he like beauty? then look as pretty as you can, for it is every woman's duty to do that; and remember that to every man the woman he loves is 'well pleasing in his sight,' even though she may not be an acknowledged beauty.

"I hope he is not cross and fault-finding, yet if he is, I have heard it hinted that it might be as well to give him a dose of his own medicine—that is if you could do it skillfully.

"At all events, don't be too tame, for men don't like to waste their ammunition on bears and unwarlike creatures; they like purchasing difficult game. Say something just a little capricious and uncertain. Don't let yourself become an 'old story,' but keep bright and short, and well posted, and up with the times. Be careful not to be too good, for it might make you seem tiresome and monotonous.

"Cultivate a sweet, pleasant voice, look well to the household expenses, and always meet him with a smile, even when the baby is sick and your head is aching.

"It may seem hard to do all this sometimes, but then under the circumstances it seems needful if you wish to 'keep a husband.'"

Don't Work on an Empty Stomach.

The errors that prevail with regard to early morning exercises are simply monstrous. Even the strong and athletic are liable to injure themselves by exercising long and vigorously in the early morning on an empty stomach, while the feeble, the dyspeptic and the nervous should not allow themselves to indulge in any unusual activity of body or muscles until the system has been fortified by at least a preliminary breakfast. Farmers sometimes injure themselves by working too hard and too long before breakfast.

Moderate exercise, such as walking, the lighter forms of gymnastics and easy games, can be taken indiscriminately, just before or after meals, without injury; but the severer tasks—rowing, active games—should usually be reserved for the middle of the forenoon or afternoon, or the evening. It is not well for us to go to our meals in a condition of exhaustion, either of the brain or muscles. It is not well to bear or faticlimes down exercising just after meals, for our own feelings will usually guide us right. After a hearty meal we do not care to plunge into the severest work.—Dr. George M. Beard.

Training Our Boys.

In the first place, don't try to make a man of your child while he is a boy. If you force him to irksome and fatiguing employment he will perform it but indifferently his heart is on his play. Let him have his play spell, to which he is as much entitled as the boy whose father is not a farmer. 'Tis but for a few years, and it will never come to him again. During his school days remember he can learn more from you than he can from his books. Show him the curiosities and varieties of plant life; the action of heat and cold; of water and sunlight; the habits of different animals. He must see this. If, however, you explain them without an accompanying illustration he will forget the story before you have done knitting it. Never repress ign for asking what appear to be silly questions; they are not silly to him; boys resent an unnecessary reproof quite as much as man. When he puts away childish things give him occasional employment on his own responsibility. Don't tell him how to do everything he sets about. He will ask you, providing he doesn't think he knows how. No matter if the work be done in a wrong way, he will then be convinced of it, while if you tell him beforehand, perhaps he will not believe you. It is better for him to fail alone than to succeed under your supervision. Encourage him to simple experiments and show him the results of your own. Impress upon him, by your own example, the importance of detail; order and system are generally more distasteful than hard work. Let him have some interest of his own, though never so small, in the increase of his farm—a few chickens, a pig, or the fruit from two or three apple trees, the proceeds of which shall be his own to do with as he chooses. The "any lamb and father's sheep" fiction is worse than no lamb at all. It won't do to extract from him something when he becomes a man—that is a long way off to him. Above all, treat him as a companion, not as a hireling or drudge. Substitute "we" for "I" in discussing your plans, and ask his opinion now and then before giving your own. Attention to these things is a small matter to you, but a great matter to him. A boy brought up under such influences is a congenial house, whatever be his occupation, will forever afterward look back upon a happy spring time of life, a possession which will, with perhaps one exception, more than anything else keep him, as a man from yielding to the temptations he must certainly encounter.

Family Fun.

A Trick in Four Acts.

Act I—A gentleman irreproachably dressed gives into a confectioner's shop in Tarn, and says to the polite proprietor:

"I want a hundred and fifty of the nicest cream tarts you can make."

"A hundred and fifty—that is a pretty large order. Do you want them at once?"

"Within three hours at the latest."

"I can have them ready at that time. Ahem! it is customary to ask a deposit on such orders—say ten francs."

"Certainly, my friend. Here are your ten francs."

Act II—About two hours later a gentleman irreproachably dressed, goes into a tailor's shop across the way from the pastry cook's and asks to be shown some cravats. He selects one of the nicest and asks the price.

"One hundred and twenty-five francs, sir!"

"Very well: I will take it. I have some money to collect, at the confectioner's across the way. I presume you have no objections to let one of your men come over with me to get it."

"Certainly not. A worthy man is my friend, Mr. Puff."

Act III—To the confectioner enter irreproachable dressed gentleman, now wearing an overcoat and tailor's young man. The confectioner greets the former with a respectful friendliness due to a good customer.

"Ah, Mr. Puff, I've called round for that one hundred and fifty you promised to have for me at 12:30."

"You shall have them in five minutes, sir."

"Very well. I have to go around the corner to see a man. You will give the young gentleman one hundred and twenty-five of the hundred and fifty. He is trusted and get the remaining twenty-five myself in a few minutes."

"With pleasure, sir."

Act IV—Five minutes later the confectioner gives the tailor's young man 125 cream tarts, and a bill for the balance thereon 21f 25c. One minute thereafter the confectioner and a tailor's young man are scouring the streets hence and yonder in search of a new customer.

A Judge's Grim Joke.

A friend repeated rather a good story to me, which it seems was sent to be a stand-by of Junius Porter, the well-known legal bon vivant of Dublin.

It was concerning a rare old Irish judge on the Nisi Prius circuit, who loved the hunting-field more than he did the stupid, sleepy court-room. His dark was likewise, and a joyous one, and

One fine morning the clerk whispered to the Judge:

"Yer Honor, old Billy Dunn's meet to-day at Rathjimsallagan, an' they're a fine fog-fox."

"How many's in the docket?" asked the Judge excitedly.

"Twenty, for rioting and breach of peace, yer Honor."

"Tim," said the Judge, "do you think you can get the first felon to plead guilty without a jury trial, and me to let him off with a week in jail?"

"The easiest thing in the world," answered the faithful clerk.

"Make haste, then, and bring the whole gang; and, I say, Tim, tell Jerry to saddle the mare meanwhile.

The Twenty Fusiens were brought into court—a defiant gang, nineteen men and a pretty fair-looking girl, and they were prepared to fight with counsel and jury to the bitter end.

The twentieth had been interviewed by the clerk.

He was called off by the clerk.

"Guilty or not guilty of the crimes charged," demanded the Judge with a proprietous smile.

"Guilty, yer honor; God help me," said the crafty prisoner.

"Well, said the Judge, glancing benevolently about the room. "I fancy I can let you off with a week."

The man thanked the Judge and stepped down to the bailiff.

There was a terrible sensation among the other defendants. Why, none of them expected to get off with less than five years.

Here was a chance to profit by "this Hooor's" pleasant mood. One and all manifested an earnest desire to follow the example of their comrade and acknowledge their crimes in a batch.

"Do you all plead guilty?" demanded the Judge sagely.

"We do!" shouted the enthusiastic nineteen in chorus.

"Fourteen years' transportation apiece," exclaimed the Judge with a click of his jaw—"Jerry, is the mare saddled yet?"

A Minority Report.

"Pa," said a little boy who had been reading the newspaper, "what is a minority report?"

"A minority report, my son?" inquiringly repeated the father.

"Yes, sir."

"Well, my son," he answered, scratching his head, "a minority report is—is—well, my son, where I say I won't, and your mother says I'd better, that's a minority report."

"Which one, pa—yours or mother's?"

"Run out and play, my son; you are too young to understand such matters. When you are older you won't have to ask so many questions."

Still a Doubtful Case.

When the grocer at Port Huron, Mich., was said that winter to have experienced religion, the attorney was carried to a prominent deacon, who inquired

"Did he confess to mixing two kinds of oats together, and selling them as No. 1?"

"I think so."

"Say anything about having worked our old butter every fall for twenty years?"

"No."

"Did he confess that he had been caught using short weights?"

"No."

"Wasn't he sorry for watering his vinegar?"

"He didn't say so."

"Well, it may be that the Lord has seen fit to poke him up a little around the edges, but before you receive him into the church you'd better give him a fair chance to pass a quarter with a hole in it. If he resists the temptation, I shall pray the Lord to continue the wrestle until Satan gets three straight falls."

A Sensible Wife.

"Now," said the bridegroom to the bride when they returned from the honeymoon trip, "let us have a clear understanding. I'm free as settle down to married life; are you to be president or vice-president of this concern?" "I want to be neither president nor vice-president, Alonzo, sir," said the bride, "I will be content with a subordinate position." "What is that?" "Cashier, sir, of the currency."

Impress upon him, by your own example, the importance of detail; order and system are generally more distasteful than hard work. Let him have some interest of his own, though never so small, in the increase of his farm—a few chickens, a pig, or the fruit from two or three apples, the proceeds of which shall be his own to do with as he chooses. The "my lamb and father's sheep" fiction is worse than no lamb at all. It won't do to promise him something when he becomes a man—the time for that is now. Above all, treat him as a companion, not as a hireling or drudge. Solicit his "ayes" or "nays" in discussing your plans, and ask his opinion now and then before giving your own. Attention to these things is a small matter to you, but a great matter to him. A boy brought up under such influences in a congenial home, whatever be his occupation, will forever afterward look back upon a happy spring time of life, a possession which will, with perhaps one exception, more than anything else keep him, as a man from yielding to the temptations he must certainly encounter.

A Trick in Four Acts.

Act I.—A gentleman irreproachably dressed goes into a confectioner's shop in Paris and says to the polite proprietor:

"I want a hundred and fifty of the nicest cream tarts you can make."

"A hundred and fifty—that is a pretty large order. Do you want them at once?"

"Within three hours at the latest."

"I can have them ready at that time. Ahem! It is customary to ask a deposit on such orders—say ten francs."

"Certainly, my friend. Here are your ten francs."

Act II.—About two hours later a gentleman, somewhat disordered, goes into a tailor's shop across the way from the pastry cook's and asks to be shown some overcoats. He selects one of the nicest and asks the price.

"Nine hundred and twenty-five francs, sir."

"Very well; I will take it. I have some money to collect at the confectioner's across the way. I presume you have no objections to let one of your men come over with me to get it."

"Certainly not. A worthy man is my friend, Mr. Puff."

Act III.—To the confectioner enter irreproachable dressed gentleman, now wearing an overcoat and tailor's young man. The confectioner greets the former with a respectful friendliness due to a good customer.

"Ah, Mr. Puff, I've called round for that one hundred and fifty you promised to have for me at 12.30.

"You shall have them in five minutes, sir."

"Very well. I have to go around the corner to see a man. You will give this young gentleman one hundred and twenty-five francs in the hundred and fifty. I will return and get the remaining twenty-five myself in a few minutes."

"With pleasure, sir."

Act IV.—Five minutes later the confectioner gives the tailor's young man 125 cream tarts, and a bill for the balance thereof, or 25f 25c. One minute thereafter the confectioner and a tailor's young man are scoring the neighborhood in search of an irreprochably dressed gentleman with a new overcoat.

A Judge's Grim Joke.

A friend reported rather a good story to me, which it seems was sent to be a stand-by of Junction Porter, the well-known legal bon vivant of Dublin.

It was concerning a rare old Irish Judge who, in Cromwellian Ireland, who loved the hunting-field more than he did the stuffy sleepy court-room. His clerk was likewise, and as a joyous pair they rode forth.

One fine morning the clerk whispered to the Judge:

"Yer Honor, old Billy Duane's mare's to be hung at Dalkyhillingham, an' they're a fine fog-fox."

"How many's in the docket?" asked the Judge excitedly.

"Twenty, for rioting and breach of peace, yer Honor."

"Tim," said the Judge, "do you think you can get the first fellow to plead guilty without a jury trial, and me to hit him off with a week in jail?"

"The easiest thing in the world," answered the faithful clerk.

"Make haste, then, and bring the whole gang; and, I say, Tim, tell Jerry to saddle the mare meanwhile."

The Twenty Fenians were brought into court—a defiant gang, nineteen of them prepared to fight with counsel and jury to the bitter end.

The nineteenth had been interviewed by the clerk.

He was called off by the clerk.

"Guilty or not guilty of the crimes charged?" demanded the Judge with a propitious smile.

"Guilty, yer honor; God help me, said the crafty prisoner.

"Well," said the Judge, planning benevolently to himself the fine, "I fancy I can let you off with a week."

The poor fellow left the Judge and stepped down to the bailiff.

There was a terrific sensation among the other defendants. Why, none of them expected to get off with less than five years in prison.

Here was a chance to profit by "his Honor's pleasant mood." One and all manifested an earnest desire to follow the example of their comrade and acknowledge their crimes in a batch.

"Do you all plead guilty?" demanded the Judge sagaely.

"We do!" shouted the enthusiastic nineteen in chorus.

"Fourteen years' transportation apiece, exclaimed the Judge with a relish of his jaw—"Jerry, is the mare saddled yet?"

A Minority Report.

"Pa," said a little boy who had been reading the newspaper, "what is a minority report?"

"A minority report, my son?" inquiringly repeated the father.

"Yes, sir."

"Well, my son," he answered, scratching his head, "a minority report is—is—well, my son, when I was a little boy, your mother says I'd better, that's a minority report."

"Which one, pa—yours or mother's?"

"Now, see here, my son; you are too young to understand such matters. When you are older you won't have to ask so many questions."

Still a Doubtful Case.

When the grocer at Port Huron, Mich., was sold last winter to have experienced religion, the statement was carried to a prominent deacon, who inquired:

"Did he confess to mixing two kinds of oats together, and selling them as No. 1?"

"I think not."

"Say anything about having worked over old butter every fall for twenty years?"

"No."

"Did he confess that he had been caught using short weights?"

"No, sir."

"Wasn't he even sorry for watering his vinegar?"

"He didn't say so."

"Well, it may be that the Lord has seen fit to poke him up a little around the edges, but before you receive him into the church you'd better give him a fair chance to pass a quarter with a hole in it. If he resists the temptation, I shall pray the Lord to continue the wrestle until Satan gets three straight falls."

A Sensible Wife.

"Now," said the bridegroom to the bride when they returned from the honeymoon trip, "let me have a clear understanding before we settle down to married life; are you to be president or vice-president of this concern?" "I want to be neither president nor vice-president," she answered, "I will content with a subordinate position." "What is that?" "Controller of the currency."

KELLEY NOT TO BE RECALLED.

Should Austria Decline to Receive him the Minister will Remain Vacant.

WASHINGTON, July 3.—It is understood that Mr. Kelley, recently appointed Minister to Austria, and whose appointment has occasioned considerable comment, will not be recalled. He will go to Vienna, and should the Austrian Government refuse to receive him it is intimated that the United States Government will remain unrepresented at the Vienna Court. It is held that Mr. Kelley, is a sensible man and is a very wag-ittie. Mr. Kelley's friends say that the reason why Mr. Kelley is so anxious to go to Austria is because of the fine delineation of Virginia and was endorsed by the Senate. The Italian Government, it is understood, made inquiry of this Government whether Mr. Kelley had given utterance to a public sentiment in 1861 in analogous to sentiments in the occupation of Rome by Victor Emanuel. Afterward, it is said, that Government protested against his appointment, and Mr. Kelley resigned the commission. It is held that the Austrian Government has on ground for complaint against Mr. Kelley.

Opinion has been raised whether it was necessary to Austria to send Mr. Kelley to Vienna, after he had been rejected by Italy. It is understood that the question was one complimentary; and the case of Mr. Kasson, who was nominated for the Austrian mission and objected to by Spain, but afterward sent to Austria when he was rejected, is cited in support of the statement that no discourtesy was offered to Austria by sending Mr. Kelley there. Some years ago, and until a very recent date, Mr. Kasson served as United States Minister at Berlin.

Alleged Conspiracy Against Kelley.

BOSTON, July 3.—A Washington special to the Herald says: The Boston Congressmen are charged with the conspiracy against Mr. Kelley, who has bought Mr. Kelley's political ambition for years, started the trouble in Vienna, being sent there for that purpose. The dispatch adds that the prominent Republicans were notified with Kasson to prevent the recognition of Mr. Kelley, and that he is worth $1,000 per annum to Francis to remain in office.

Minister Kelley Will Not Resign.

WASHINGTON, June 28.—A Virginia journalist says in his city, and an old friend of Minister Kelley remembers the statement that Mr. Kelley's wife is a German by birth. He says: "While it is true that Mrs. Kelley is of Hebrew descent, she years ago embraced the Roman Catholic faith, and has had all her children baptized in the Catholic faith. Her son Joseph is in holy orders. He says that the President has consulted Mr. Kelley, and he is likely to do

The Wonderful Constitution of an Irish Woman.

A single carriage followed a hearse from No. 1, Dale-street, a short and narrow lane in the Fourth Ward, yesterday, and the long curved the bridge and went to the cemetery at Flatbush. This was the funeral cortege of Mrs. Mary Murphy, a part of the inscription on whose coffin plate, which shone in the sunlight, was born in County Cork, Ireland. Some seventeen years ago Mrs. Murphy, who was then living with William Lynch, in Dale-street, was seized with a fever which she brought home to Williamsburgh, Mr. Murphy, or Ned, as he was usually called, died of fever, leaving to Mrs. Bridget Murphy, a kindly soul, her husband, and the much maligned, but shrewd and kind-hearted Mrs. Murphy, a kindly soul, she had lived, and there she died.

This was a little bit of a woman, but even at 50 she was shapeless and active. She had a clear blue eye, which probably resulted in her premature blindness, and her Hibernian complexion remained clear, and her form was as straight as its owner. She was born at 100 years remained shapely, and was commented on with admiration by her friends. Her last illness was only a week, and the cause of her death was a cold, which she had taken in her feet, and which settled on her lungs. She died at 10 o'clock on the delight of the household, and at 11 she was dead as lifeless as a log with "Cosa," while the rest of her relatives and friends in New York's habits were cured. She constantly took "a bit of brandy" for her stomach's sake, a sip of beer. But she knew where to draw the line. She had not taken a drop of liquor for years.

Two years ago she began to fail. Her mind "became weak" at times, and she became "like a baby," as good Mrs. Bridget Murphy put it. Her memory extended over a few years, but there was one well-spread. On Monday, the day before her death, she was "as bright as a button," and could all by the hour in a chair placed at the open door door, looking up to the bridge, and there she would tell of the days of her childhood. At times she would tire and try to walk when the Bridget Murphys were not by her side. Then she would fall, and strong arms would lift up delicate Mrs. Murphy, and place her tenderly in her bed. Her mind wandered at times. She would talk of her husband, and of her "boy" Joe, who was in Ireland, and would speak of Mrs. Bridget Murphy's kindness to her. But, when she was in her right mind, she was fond of weeping over her husband, and would speak of Joe, who could speak in Irish and English.

Mrs. Murphy's death was a shock to her friends. At times she would rise

Literary Miscellany.

Pierre Leroux's Temptation.

A gentlemen of the name of Farquhar, sent a few summers ago to a town on the north coast of France, on the occasion of passing some weeks there. The morning after his arrival he went to a hairdresser to get his English money changed for French. His afternoon took a walk about the town, and visited the quays and the pier, and then strolled on the sands. After walking about for some time he went into a shop, and putting his hand into his pocket to pay for some trifling article, found that he had lost his purse. It contained all the money he had with him, and he knew that if he could not recover it he would be reduced to very uncomfortable embarrassments before he could receive any remittances from home. He attempted to retrace his steps, in the forlorn hope that he should see it lying on the ground. But after fatiguing himself for some time in vain, he returned to his hotel in a very disconsolate mood, and made his disaster known to the landlord. The landlord advised him to lose no time in stating the circumstances to the chief magistrate, or sort of mayor, of the town. This person received Mr. Farquhar with the politeness which a Frenchman invariably shows to a stranger, and promised to render him every assistance in his power; and he immediately dispatched officers of police to make inquiries in all parts the town, and also to observe if any poor person was seen to spend any considerable or unusual sum of money. He then desired Mr. Farquhar to come again the next day, when he should be informed of the result of these inquiries. Mr. Farquhar then went back to the inn to dinner, for which the reflection that he had no present means of paying for it somewhat spoiled his appetite.

He must here leave him at his melancholy meal, and go to a house in the suburbs inhabited by Pierre Leroux, a poor fisherman. We shall find nobody at home but Katrine his wife, if, indeed, we can call her albeit when but thoughts were absent with her husband and her children, the boys, who had gone out early in the morning to fish, and whose lengthened absence was beginning to fill her with apprehension.

"Ah, my poor Pierre," said she to herself "now he risks his life every day in that old boat! Surely something must lose happened. If he had a better boat I should not mind so much, but this is such a worthless leaky thing, that, if we had money enough to buy another, or at least to get this mended! Ruthin children, poor things, must be tired, though ever so young, and the boys must have rickets, and all the money we can spare goes to mending the tools, which are getting old and bad. Ah, dear, a fisherman's life is a dreadful one, particularly with an old, leaky boat!"

Here her soliloquy was interrupted by the entrance of her daughter Jannetton, a little half-clad, barefooted girl of about eight years old, whose dark eyes sparkled, and her set off, according to the fashion of her country and station, with a short white cap, and a pair of long, dangling gold ear rings.

"Oh, mother, dear mother!" exclaimed the child, "I have seen what I have seen!"

"Oh, what a crimson silk purse, apparently well filled."

"How didst thou come by this?" said the mother, "surely thou didst not steal it."

"Oh, no," answered the child, "I should be sorry to do such a wicked thing as that. I found it. Just now, as I was clambering up the cliff in search of faggots I was coming, I happened to see something fine and red lying on the sands, just by the great stone that is made into a seat. So, with a hop and two jumps, down I ran, to have a look at it. It was a pretty purse it is! and see!"

Katrine had by this time emptied it of its contents, and counted forty-nine silver pieces, six more shillings and eight pence, and fifteen or sixteen francs. There were a few half-crowns and shillings besides, and there, and the appearance of the purse, which was certainly anything rather than French, indicated that it belong to some English person. Katrine, who had never before seen so much money together, and had scarcely seen half so many, and counted it over a dozen times to satisfy herself that it was not dreaming. She was a good, honest creature in her own way, and would not have absolutely gone out of her way to do a dishonest thing. But close connection with the sea had not quite blunted her moral dexterity. It never occurred to her the money was not because her own lawful property, and that, according to the strict sense of it in imagination to the supply of the wants of her family, was a good thing, and the most necessary, was a new boat; then she clothed her children, and dress, then a bed, then a table, then a porter of St. Nicholas with a fine goose, a gridiron, a cow, and, at last, a better and a larger house. Her busy fancy ran over all the things she wanted, and whatever it was possible to want. The money seemed to her unlimited in extent, and no amount she had spent it too times over.

In the midst of these pleasant cogitations, Pierre and his sons returned, wet, tired, cold and hungry, and the father cut cigarettes at the bad success he had had.

"Never mind about a few fish," said the wife; "I have something here that's worth all the fish you catch in a twelvemonth. Look what I've got!"

At the sight of the purse, Pierre looked horrifiedly at it and stammered,

"How did you come by it?" said he.

"Is a blessed piece of fortune you," said Katrine. "Jannetton picked it up on the sands, somebody must have dropped it."

"And what do you mean to do with it?" replied her husband.

"Do with it? Why, buy what we want with it, to be sure. Then shall have half the money to get into a good boat, and I'll keep the rest to buy some clothes and whatever else we want. I've promised Jannetton a new petticoat ever since last New Year's Day, but we have had other things to think of, petticoat, and a fine smart one, too."

"Not ours," replied Katrine, "whose is this?"

"Pierre. It is the owner's, the person who has lost it."

"Katrine. But wouldn't know who that is, and, if we did, we should be ashamed to give it back."

"Ashamed!" exclaimed the wife, "what for? Is it our fault that we don't know who that is, and, if we did, we should be ashamed to give it back?"

"Journalism is the greatest social power, however it be the chief agent in popularizing knowledge, guiding or misleading public opinion, forming character and controlling the destinies of the human race. Its influence is not only a powerful one in society, and a work quite possible to the welfare of society, but a work at again fulfilled. What it and what it should be, are questions which have not been sufficiently considered by Catholics generally. The Divine Redeemer, Apostles, Teachers, Martyrs, Saints, Doctors.

—It is hard to tell, says the Ypsilanti Sentinel, where this enterprise of the Fathers of Notre Dame I believe it is called. Their last undertaking is the construction of a hotel car, of the most luxurious description, for their western students. These the students from Colorado, New Mexico, Mexico, etc., will travel in a body, in the car of their Alma mater, to their respective homes. The journey from South Bend to the City of Mexico occupies a week. Several members of the faculty will accompany the students on their trip home, and the arrangement of having a special hotel car to convey such students is certainly to be popular and attractive. Notre Dame has no State treasury to hammer at for funds, but some how, when she starts for anything she "gits thar," just the same.

—These Catholic young ladies who think that roller skating with every second roué that resorts to the rink is "just too lovely for anything," should take warning by the following caution from the columns of the London Pall Mall Gazette, where one of the London fast men makes this admission: "The evil you have exposed is a warning against roller skating. The evil came with roller skating at the Princess Club. There for the first time men about town were brought into daily contact with beautiful children, not members of their own families. The Immoral Tendency of Proti-estantism.

From the very first hour when Martin Luther's mind was filled with the unholy conception of Protestantism, immorality has reaped supremo in that sectarian scheme of religious error. During the lives even of the Reformers themselves, the grossest immorality practiced among them by their disciples. And, in our own day, the horrible and filthy revelations made through numerous trials in the Court of Queen's Bench London in the front rank among the Sodomite cities of the world! What a suitable position for the metropolis of the greatest Protestant nation in the world to occupy! Luther's last was the corner-stone upon which the edifice of error known as Protestantism was erected. And how can it be possible for pure morality to flow from an impure source? Hence we need not be surprised to learn that the titled aristocracy of England are befouled by crimes whose very names are synonymous with the deepest dye of the foulest fiends.

What are the principal designs of modern Protestantism? First, a full and free gratification of all the passions. Second, a life of ease, unbelief and irresponsibility to any power greater than self-will. Third, a thorough disregard for any commandments from God which interferes with the human appetite, inordinate passion, avarice or other acts contrary to the Decalogue or Christian Doctrine. For one—outside the Catholic Church—ever think of curbing their passions or regulating their conduct in accordance with the principles propounded by the Son of God, hence it is only natural that the underflow of even our first society should be the foulest kind of filth. It was so in Dublin Castle when United Ireland commenced to clean out that Augean stable; it is so in Windsor Castle, as demonstrated by the Pall Mall Gazette, and the same disgraceful state of beastly immorality exists in every Protestant community throughout the world today.

We need not go out of our own State in order to prove that valvet covered vice exists on all the enormous impurity even in the very city dedicated to St. Francis! As the Protestant Parish said last week.

What are the shortcomings of the Shaw-Hill trial? A prominent man of this city died a few months ago, and in his safe were found the names of 120 of the opposite sex with whom he had been intimate. The listing investigation of the Society for the Suppression of Vice showed an amount of immorality and indecency in our midst which is startling, and which should be checked and reversed by the usual, rigorous process of law and gospel.

But of what avail are the efforts of "the good people," against the might of moneyed men and the evil political influence of their parasites? Virtue is poor and powerless, while vice is rich and powerful, and as it is among the latter class that the worst crimes are committed, it is safe to say that this phase of Protestantism will prevail in every land impregnated with the principles of Joseph Luther and his mistress—immorality—the Catholic Church!

England—be it remembered in the notion that strongest of propagandists, "Protestant nations." Yet the popular assumption that Christianity, Wealth, deliberately, Poverty, barter and sale, Virtue! Yet, cultured, civilized Protestant England must also be remembered, is the nation that assumes to teach morality to the whole Christian world, when the reverse one demonstrates prove that her princes, peers and rich plebians are one and all inoculated with vice that cries to heaven for vengeance. But the lives these people lead are steeped in lasciviousness; they practice neither prudence, self-denial or mortification of any kind; hence they are infested with an egotism which verges on the infernal, and puffed up with a pride similar to that which transformed the angels of heaven into the demons of hell. This, too, is the natural result of a religion founded in the foeshish spirit of rebellion against God and His constituted authority—the Catholic Church.

What Charity Can Accomplish.

If Catholics desire to ascertain what can be accomplished by unity of action on the part of a few Catholic men, they need only read the reports of the St. Vincent de Paul Society. We are in receipt of the report of the Superior Council of New York, made to the General Council in Paris, for the year 1884. Two hundred and sixty (260) Conferences of this most admirable charitable association are named in this Report. During the year 1884, five Conferences were aggregated; and nine Conferences make their first reports. Here is the excellent showing of the Society for the year 1884: Number of poor families visited and relieved, 12,771; number of visits paid to poor families, 122,667; families on the relief roll, December 31, 3,067; situations procured, 700; members assisting in teaching Sunday school, 434; average number of boys attending Sunday school, 40,296. The total receipts for the year amounted to $130,862; expenditures for the relief of all kinds to the poor, $128,509; balance at the end of the year, $37,958.

It must be borne in mind that this vast relief of Catholic benevolence has been accomplished by laymen who have to pursue their daily avocations, yet who can find sufficient time to help God's poor out of their temporary difficulties. How true it is that the time we give to God is never lost, and great will be the reward of those who earnestly and prudently share in the good work inaugurated by St. Vincent de Paul.

—A late cablegram says the death of the Emperor William promises to be the next sensation in Europe. The news of his death is daily expected. Its immediate political effect will be to bind Germany and England together in a very close union. The crown Princess of England will be the empress of Germany, and the coming Kaiser is known as an affectionate friend of the Prince of Wales and of Queen Victoria.

Sacrificial Martyr.

We always expect upon the Christian precept of religion, good for evil whenever an opportunity offers, hence when an see the born storming sect of Methodism enviously barren, a single smile believe exist, we desire to [illegible] the deficiency by proposing to star [illegible] Methodist martyrdom with the name of the Sacrificial Martyr to John Wesley! Poor John! As a henpecked husband he deserves the deep sympathy of suffering humanity! Poor, poor John! Wedded to a scolding wife, he could scarcely wash out the sad remembrances which she raised up to him must have been a veritable voyage through life with a vinegar!

We publish on the second page of the present issue a letter which has recently come to light, and which fully exhibits the hatred, bitterness and fiend indictment which Protestantism—the Church of Christ—has shown towards the Catholic Church. The letter is a sample of the vulgar and diabolical faculties and a personality that should, and will, end well.

WHAT IS HERESY AT THE CENTURY.

Heresy is a word which has changed, from its cultivate all the various faculties of mind and to the exercise of the will, and to the development of strength. A man may have the body well developed, and yet be a coward, and yet be a man of great strength, and yet be a coward. Heresy is a word which has changed from its original meaning, and yet it is a word which is used in the world. Under the present system of education, the intellects have been trained to that extent that they are so well developed that they are so well developed that they are so well developed

"O, never mind; its good enough for dresses," said Lydia carelessly. Lydia had been visiting Emily's home, and had always appeared in the prettiest morning dresses, with neat hair and dainty collars and cuffs; but now that she was back at home again, she seemed to think that anything would answer, and want about untidy and in soiled finery. At her uncle's she had been pleasant and politic; and had won golden opinions from all, but with her own family her manners were as careless as her dress. She seemed to think that courtesy and kindness were too expensive for home wear, and that anything would do for home folks. Lydia's uncle and family were in Paris seem to think that anything will do for home; whereas, effort is keep one's self neat, and to treat father mother, sister, brother, and servant kindly and courteously is as much a duty as to keep from falsehood and stealing.

A Few Simple Remedies.

A teaspoonful of charcoal in a half a glass of warm water often relieves a sick headache. It absorbs the gases, and relieves the distended stomach, pressing against the nerves extending from the stomach to the head.

Charcoal forms an unrivalled poultice for wounds and old sores. It is also invaluable for what is called proud flesh. It is a great disinfectant. It sweetens the air if placed in shallow dishes around the apartment.

Coal water is also purified by its use. Charcoal, pounded fine, and sifted through a muslin bag and bind on, and when the bark is dry put it in the vinegar, and let it boil a short time; then bathe the sore with the decoction and bind on the bark.

There is nothing better for a cut than powdered resin. Put a few cents worth, powdered, in a tight bottle, and when you are nearly off it in on the cut. Put soft cloth around the injured member, and wet it in water once in a while; it will prevent inflammation and soreness.

Hoarseness and tickling in the throat are best relieved by a gargle of the white of an egg beaten to a froth in half a glass of warm sweetened water.

Hiccough can be immediately relieved by administering a lump of sugar wet with vinegar.

A simple and harmless remedy and preventative for persons suffering from car sickness is a sheet of writing paper worn next to the person directly over the chest. It is highly recommended and seldom fails.

Hot at any drug store one ounce of camphorated oil and five cents worth of chloroform of potash, and whenever a soreness appears in the throat put the potash in half a tumbler of water and gargle the throat, then rub the neck thoroughly with the camphorated oil at night before going to bed, and also pin around the throat a small strip of woollen flannel. This is a cheap and sure remedy for sore throat.

If persons suffering from severe headaches would tie a handkerchief around the temples they would find relief by doing so in a very short time.

Hemorrhage of the lungs or stomach is promptly checked by small doses of salt. The patient should be kept as quiet as possible.

A good remedy for warts and corns. Drop a little vinegar on the wart or corn, once it immediately will cooking soda or saleratus, let it remain ten minutes. Repeat several times a day for three days and the warts and corns will be gone.

The Dry Goods Bill.

Nothing seems more unreasonable than the dignified superiority of the husband to the brother who first presches the unimportance of dress, perhaps constantly fortifying his words by his own example, and then turns to criticise his wife or daughter for being less well-dressed than some fair neighbor who gives her whole mind to that absorbing department. Does he really suppose that a woman can be forgiven by giving to it three-quarters of an hour in the Spring and three-quarters of an hour in the Autumn, which are all, as James Parton boasts, that a man now needs to devote to his tailor? Let the wife neglect what has been called the "gospel of good grass" as completely as the husband disregards that of good hats, for instance, and let him see how he likes it. But whether he adopts this policy of indifference or not, let him at least be consistent. If we hold it the duty of intellectual women to be well-dressed women also, let us give them full credit for doing the double duty. If, on the other hand, we make no such demand on them, let us cease from sneering at the faded "waterproof" of the literary woman and the dyed and turned dress, and even the short hair cut off, let us charitably suppose, to save time for study or for work. In the same way, if the husband expects his wife to be well-dressed, let him not sneer at the time necessarily spent in shopping, or even groan at the bills when the results of shopping come in. Let him not complain, as I heard a young husband the other day, that his wife when they meet all ways talk about dress, when perhaps the very point under discussion was the question how to dress so that thousands wished without its costing those husbands too much money.

Farm and Home.

How the "Best" Butter is Made.

A Berkshire County, Mass, farmer writes: "My object has always been to make the best butter—not the most profitable, necessarily, but the best. Having this object in view, I have been compelled to discard old tools, and thus reduce the quantity of my butter and the value of the manure. They have been adapted to some one else's all basement cellars, and have consequently required less butter for a given amount of food. I have been forced, instead of dropping the manure into a convenient cellar below the cows, to give up this cellar and wheel the manure into a shed. I have been obliged to discard deep setting, and to contend myself with the open, shallow method, which is more expensive, and requires more attention, and returns less butter. I have been obliged to feed all kinds of meal except corn, wheat, hay beets and carrots. I have been obliged to give up using the milk of cows that have calved too recently or too recently. I have, for a dozen years, carefully and faithfully tried to make butter as good as it could be made; this has been the first condition, profitableness has always been secondary. The result has been that for many years this butter has brought a higher price than any butter in the county of Berkshire, where much good butter is made, and it has taken the first prize over the country. It has been in such constant demand at 65 cents a pound, the year through, that when making 100 pounds each there have been unfilled orders for 25 to 50 pounds more.

Good Enough for Home.

"Lydia, why do you put on that forlorn old dress?" asked Emily Manners of her cousin, after she had spent the night at Lydia's home.

The dress in question was a spotted faded old summer silk, which only looked the more forlorn for its once fashionable trimmings, now crumpled and faded.

"O, anything is good enough for home," said Lydia hastily pinning on a soiled collar, and twisting up her hair in a ragged knot, she want to breakfast.

"Your hair is coming down," said Emily.

"O, never mind; its good enough for dresses," said Lydia carelessly. Lydia had been visiting Emily's home, and had always appeared in the prettiest morning dresses, with neat hair and dainty collars and cuffs; but now that she was back at home again, she seemed to think that anything would answer, and want about untidy and in soiled finery. At her uncle's she had been pleasant and politic; and had won golden opinions from all, but with her own family her manners were as careless as her dress. She seemed to think that courtesy and kindness were too expensive for home wear, and that anything would do for home folks. Lydia's uncle and family were in Paris seem to think that anything will do for home; whereas, effort is keep one's self neat, and to treat father mother, sister, brother, and servant kindly and courteously is as much a duty as to keep from falsehood and stealing.

A Great Consolation.

The minister of a fashionable church once preached a sermon on this subject. He drew the picture of a very fashionable house. We would walk in satin grows by the music of waterfalls, and gaze upon amaranthine fields.

"And then, too, we shall know each other there," said the minister, and then added, "Here I be no stranger in the New Jerusalem; we will all be friends.

"Beautiful!" said Deacon Shaas, as he trotted down the aisle.

"A lovely sermon," said Miss Simpkins, as she gathered her lovely hand into the minister's.

Shaa was stopped by a poor mechanic, who came up and addressed the preacher with

"Mr. ——, I am glad we shall recognize each other there."

"Yes," said the minister, "it is one of the comfortable considerations of religion."

"Well, I'm right glad we shall know each other. It will be a great change, though, I scarcely recognized me just. But—we shall know each other there.

Thought it was her Husband.

A stout, able bodied lady was wrung the door bell violently one night lately, and on opening down stairs she discovered a man tumbling around in the dark. The lady immediately assaulted him with the broom of a vigorous and spirited him from the house in quick time, and returned to her bed in a time at all, and slammed the door after him. As the man tumbled down into the sidewalk he was collared by a policeman and promptly marched off to the lockup. Then at morning assayed of her friends called and congratulated her upon the heroism displayed in throwing a burglar out of her house.

"Burglar!" exclaimed the lady, growing pale and agitated, "was that a burglar!"

"Why, certainly, didn't you know it?"

"Know it! Heavens, no! I thought it was only my husband come home from the lodge, or I wouldn't have done what I did for the world.

Mose Schaumburg's Dilemma.

The rain was coming down by the barrel-full, as Gilbooly stepped into Mose Schaumburg's store. Mose wore a very gloomy look.

"Why, Mose, what makes you look so blue?"

"No wonder I looks blue, Mother risk broke. It rains so much all de times and I hall got a pig stock of umbrellas on hand.

"I should think that rainy weather would be the very time for you to make hay while the sun shines, so to speak."

"No, sir; dot vas a great mistake. You see it rains so steady dot de peoples can't put their umprellas long enough down for them to be stolen.

"Well?"

"Vall, don't you see I ll the peoples don't put down dose umprellas on the floor, dere vas no one vas enough."

Just at this moment the rain shone out from behind a cloud, and its rays fell on the head of the sentimental Israelite, who looked like one of the pictures of a saint with a beatific smile, with a halo about his head, by one of the old masters.

No Need of Defense.

A gigantic negro, who had crippled up half the police force in their efforts to secure him, was brought from the jail to the office of the Justice for trial. Not charging that the accused had any counsel employed, the Justice asked:

"Don't you want a lawyer to defend you?"

"Ain't dat jes' de question I'm asking, and pounding on the table, roared out

"I don't need anything or defend me. I kin defend myself against a dozen such lockin men as you is. If you don't believe me, come out in de back yard and see if you ain't de man what needs er be defended."

More Thanness.

Twas war thus from childhood's hours, I've seen my fondest hopes decay; I never tried to save an hoss but he died in a day. I never took a girl to church, but she left me in the lurch, and walked back with another man. I never had a friend gentle to plod me with its dark bluz eyes, but had a gnat which smocked me out; "My life is marred with hatte," said I.

Family Fun.

He was from Chicago.

"May I have a seat?" she asked, as she entered the car, of the genteel-looking gentleman, whose baggage was occupying it.

"I don't know 'as am," he answered politely. "It belongs to the railroad, you know; but I'll see the conductor, and maybe he can give it to you."

She grew purple and said:

"You don't understand ma. I mean can I take it?"

"Well, I don't know that either. You see, it is fastened very firmly to the car floor, and would be troublesome to get up; however, I'll ask a carpenter to come on board at the next station and ask his advice."

"I don't want to take the old thing," she howled. "Are these your traps on it?"

"No ma'am, they belong to the drunkest man you ever saw on a train I ever owned."

"Well, can I sit down here?" she finally screamed, after shifting from foot one to the other.

"I don't know, mam'm. You are the best judge of your muscular powers."

"What do you travel here?" she screamed.

"Chicago," he replied.

"That settles it," she said, sweetly; "will you please move your valise and perhaps I can occupy a small portion of this seat?"

"Certainly," he said, "why didn't you say that at first?"

The train speed on, while he sat counting up his expenses, and she wondering if Chicago clerk had an equal under the sun.

Didn't Want Any.

A colored man who had a slight acquaintance with one of the staff keepers at the Central Market hung around for half an hour the other day before saying:

"See yer, boss, I wants to ax you a question or two."

"All right."

"I kin get my household furnicher insured for $400."

"Yes."

"An' it won't cost but $5?"

"Well, suppose I had dat furnicher insured an' de house should catch fah an' everything burn up?"

In that case, my colored brother, you'd be jerked into jail so quick that your head wouldn't have time to swim, and from the jail you'd go to State prison for at least ten years."

"Wha, dat for?"

"Why, for setting the fire."

"An' dat possible? Well, I'm werry much obleeged to yer, an' I'm made up my mind to save $5 an' lai de $400 go."

BURNED TO DEATH.

Six Children Perish Before the Eyes of Their Parents.

PITTSBURG, July 17.—Last night the residence of Josiah Hornbeck, near Coal Hill, in Jefferson township, Clearfield county, was destroyed by fire and six of his children perished. The ages of the children were from 6 to 12 years. The mother, who was awakened by strange noises, said, she took the impression that burglars were about, to look for her husband, who was supposed to be discovered in a dwelling in Salem. Mrs. Hornbeck ran to the children, who were sleeping on the second floor, the roof fell in and she barely escaped, being badly burned herself. The children suffocated, or perished in the flames. The public appeals to the occupants of the burning building for the rescue of their children proved futile. Afterward, it is against the supposition, Government is Mr. Keeley.

IRELAND.

ANOTHER ENGLISH OUTRAGE.

A Colorado Priest Arrested at Queenstown.

Rev. Father Brennan, who, says the Denver Republican, is a leading light in the city among the members of the Catholic Church, and among citizens as a fearless critic of Wall Street rule, and who is now paying a visit to his parents in Ireland, recently had an experience with detectives and made an addition to the many American citizens arrested by the agents of the British Government.

As it was known by his friends, Father Brennan, two weeks before his departure, had been the recipient of his health. He took passage by the splendid steamship Germanic, on which there last week. His arrival at Queenstown was marked by very much more of an ovation than the Rev. gentleman anticipated. He had hardly set foot on the tender and was placed under arrest by the British authorities, who evidently suspected him of being a dynamiter or an agitator of a dangerous sort.

PRIVATE PROPERTY SEIZED.

His baggage was subjected to search, and copies of Denver and Rocky Mountain News and Tribune-Citizen were found. Among them were certain numbers which were interdicted in Ireland, and they were confiscated by the custom officials, despite his protest. He was held under arrest quite a period, and it was only after an expert had been called in and had pronounced the matter was finally released. The long surveillance was continued, however, and it was only after an expert had been called in and had pronounced the matter was finally released. The long surveillance was continued, however, and it was only after an expert opinion, in regard to which he expressed no knowledge, was obtained that he was finally released. Inquiry was made of him as to whether or not it he caused it to be published.

After his release Father Brennan departed for the home of his parents at Ballyhar, Kilmore County Kerry, and is still sojourning there.

Father Brennan is a brother-in-law and assistant pastor of St. Elizabeth's Church, West Twenty-fifth street, Denver, and is well known in Colorado. He is now about thirty years of age, and since his ordination has been thrown into very hard times of persecution which he has endured like a true priest. He was compelled to frequently perform his priestly functions, in the early days, in the open, and in the Catholic's trade in Wisconsin, serving mass in the office of the Catholic Herald, in Milwaukee. While he has left his trade to the Mother calling, of which he is a worthy member, he has always retained his interest in journalism, and has contributed to the columns of the Catholic papers since his ordination. He is during his present visit to his native land, a contributor to the Rocky Mountain News (of this city).

Father Brennan is a nephew of Archbishop Fallon of Denver, and is a cousin of Colonel Fallon's five boys. Whatever he may do, he will be the Church successfully in Colorado.

A PRIESTLY SERVICE.

It was during his pastorate in Dunsage that Father Brennan had the opportunity to perform a duty under circumstances of a character which gave him a public prominence. The occasion was the administration of the last sacraments to the dying Mr. Parnell.

After his return to Ireland, Father Brennan was ordained a priest, and was assistant pastor at Ballinakill's Church until about two years ago, when which time he has been laboring in behalf of a church at Dunsage.

Failing in health and feeling a longing to see his parents and friends in his native land, he obtained leave of absence which made his present trip possible.

During the four years of his work in Colorado he made many friends, who will be glad to learn of his success in Ireland. Many of the friends and acquaintances of the rights and wrongs of the Irish agitation and of the attitude of the English Government towards Ireland, he has been pronounced and outspoken in his views, and will without doubt be heard from over there in his convictions after his late personal experience.

The news of his arrest and the release on bail reached Denver in the morning papers of the evening, and there was a great rejoicing among the Catholic people of the Irish American ancestry of the city.

A DEFEAT FOR PARNELL.

But It Shakes the Grip He Has Got on the New Government.

LONDON, July 17.—In the House of Commons this afternoon Parnell dwelt on the alleged outrages in Ireland, which he said were imaginary. He moved that the Irish Crimes Act be repealed. He was the duty of Parliament to institute a strict inquiry into the outrages in question. Mr. Gladstone, in reply, said he was of the opinion, "that the Irish Members of the House of Commons, by the manner of the prosecution of the outrages in question, have put the onus on the spot in the cases mentioned, the jurors who sat in the cases, and the witnesses who gave evidence." Mr. Gladstone said that the Irish Members had in a single case insinuated that the jurors were guilty of perjury in forcing four or five innocent men to plead guilty to the charge of murder. Speaking as a lawyer, he believe if ever a murderer deserved to be pardoned, it was the man who murdered Lord Cavendish and Mr. Burke.

Sir Stafford Northcote, a member for Wickham, seconded Parnell's motion and hoped that the government would take a lesson from their predecessors, and not be "Parnellites" on the duty of office.

Mr. Michael Hicks Beach said the present Government had nothing to say concerning the conduct of the Irish Members during the period of the late Government. He was, however, bound to state that Lord Carnarvon was present. The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Mr. Parnell, and Mr. Gladstone, had, in consequence, been compelled to consult with the House to resent Parnell's action, which was a defeat of Lord Spencer, a member of the late Government.

Parnell's motion was negatived without a division. During the debate Sir Vernon Harcourt warmly defended the late Government.

Lord Randolph Churchill praised Parnell's action of Gladstone, and the necessity pro-Irish Ireland only by dressing themselves of all sympathy with the Irish people, and by taking the interest in the Irish question, and in regard to which he expressed no knowledge, was obtained that he was finally released. The long surveillance was pasted to Parnell whether it was wise or fair to institute a prosecution.

Parnell said the request was reasonable and he would be willing to release the jurors. Mr. Parnell said it looked like a compact between Parnell and the Government.

Lectures, July 18.—The Times in a leading article on Irish affairs says: "The signs of a closer union between the Marquis of Salisbury and Parnell are not to be mistaken. The Marquis has made a combination of the Conservatives and the Parnellites, and is ready to accept their assistance, unless it be the effrontery with which the Parnellites have taken the Marquis's measure. Parnell more completely than ever makes the master of himself.

THE CABLE EXPOSED.

How the Lies are Manufactured.

Use countrymen in America get practically no intelligence of what are accounts of marriage. The system is worked this way—Dr. Patrick Cronin, Chicago, Ill., is a man of great influence and fortune, and the first American Archbishop of Dublin, Dr. Kenrick, of St. Louis, Mo., is a man of great influence and fortune. It has frequently been under consideration amongst the Irish party, apart from the Home Rule question, to bring in a Bill to punish the circulation of false news. If the producers of any newspaper were entitled to call on the proprietor, or the proprietor, for redress, to prove a jury the substantial truth of any statement in the paper complained of by him, there would very quickly be an end to the half a crown lie system of which the English Press lives. The Irish Press, we say still, has never contributed the slightest assistance to the Land League. In 1882, after the publishing of the lies by Newspaper Correspondents, the Irish Press was for a hopeless battle. The committee still have trouble up in foreign papers, and, not one in a hundred of them, ever sees the truth, or has the backbone to publish it, which killed the poor people of Ireland." United Ireland.

CONVERSIONS TO IRELAND.

The Huguenots Come to be Re-Considered.

NEW YORK, July 19. With the sole exception of the Paris Matin and Figaro, all the papers of London, Turf and Literary alike, join in denouncing the proposed Government bill for the Huguenots cases. In Ireland the result is already received with rapturous joy. The most remarkable feature of the debate was the almost universal abandonment of Lord Spencer. The language which is being organized in honor of the late Viceroy does him as much harm as good. Lord Randolph Churchill and Tulke have placed positive statements, and the affair will be almost purely Whig. A memorial in favor of the bill has also been signed by the Marquis of Salisbury, Lord Cavendish, Lord Hartington, and Mr. Chamberlain, and it is thought certain that it will be passed, there will be a wholesale release of men convicted by packed juries under the Crimes Act. If the liberals continue to excite the passions of their English constituents against the Tories for the Government to Parnell, it is possible that the Tories will return to power. The Tory combinations of the over-riding Parnellites and Conservatives, is a combination of a character of which will be effective, as it is called, the "Tories, nous." Parnell is now seeking another success by pressing the Land Purchase bill, the first reading of which has been very favorable. The Parnellites will probably accept the bill as a method of easing the land market and a step toward the national buying out of landlords, while at the same time helping the Tories by giving them a solid legislative triumph.

THE LANGUAGE OF OSSIAN.

LYONS, Cal., July 20, 1885.

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR:

Dear Sir—Believing that nothing which concerns freshness or appreciation of Ireland should be foreign to me, I claim sufficient space to the expression to some thoughts suggested by the perusal of an article on the Irish Language in the recent issue of the Monitor. I know the discouraging circumstances of the language, and that Society for the revival of the language, and literature prosecute their laudable and patriotic work, but this I do believe, and I believe sincerely, that the language of Erin's youth has strong, tender, and indelible claims to our time and talents.

The spirit, energy, and patriotic zeal of O'Curry and O'Donovan earned from Irish Catholics a debt of gratitude, which Ireland's noblest splendor, but to complete the work, it is not enough that the Irish people should be stirring, perishing, without one still more earnest effort on our part to save and perpetuate a sacred relic.

THE CATHOLIC SISTERHOODS.

They gather them from the lanes,
From the dens of the vile crime of sin,
From the homes where sorrow reigns,
While the children's hearts are wan.

They teach them the lore of God,
They teach them to sing and pray,
They point to the lustral sod,
And the radiant realms of day.

Who says that the life seek Repose in the cloister's shade?
No childishness and weak
Where is not so many needs.

They gather them in from the lanes,
They gather the children in
Where the Spirit and Beauty reigns
Over the spirit of woe and sin.

If I were so content child,
My crushed grief would be
To part from those mothers mild
And have it on the field.

I must have you recollect,
Those women, so pure and meek,
Were, likely enough, once decked
With the fashion's latest freak.

But, loving their Saviour more,
Than a season's joy and pride,
They relented the world's Queen,
For the sake of Him Who died.

Just think of what a life is theirs,
Ye daughters that throng the street!
Ah! you've space in their prayers,
And all at their holy feet.

They gather them in from the lanes,
They gather the children in,
They teach them the sweetest lessons,
Which the world has ever been.

And looks on in the distant mine,
Ha! with the humble, grateful tone,
Some precious jewels that shine.

He will hold on the sons and say:
"Your feet and your tears shall cease;
Lo, the spirit it has passed away,
And the home for you now is—Peace."

THE CONVENT IN THE DELL.

BY J. SAYANOR.

It stands there still, now hoary with age,
Neath a cluster of old elm trees,
Which bend their heads, and sighing lovingly
Down
Upon the roof, as if to shield it from the storm.
Where the slanting cushions fall,
In the shade of the trees, with the evening breeze
By the convent in the dell.

There oft have I sat on that rustic seat,
In the midst of that flower-decked glen,
And dreamt bright dreams of the future
Away from the bustle of men;
There oft I have heard on a summer's eve
The sweet strains of an Angelus bell,
Like a message of peace on the evening air,
From the convent in the dell.

And now though many years have fled
Since I stood in that dear old glade,
And many dear friends of my childhood
In the silent dwelling are laid,
Before my mind the scene will rise,
And on them I love in dreams,
The school on the hill, the creaky old mill,
And the convent in the dale.

Literary Miscellany.

Nancy O'Beirne's Lesson.

BY ANNA T. SADLIER.

It was a gloomy and lonely spot, in the hollow of an Irish hillside, under an Irish sky. The cabin was a poor little place, with its patch of turf beside it, where the potatoes grew, and its clay floor inside the walls, and its one narrow little window. But in that cabin dwelt an honest man and his son over those spots. Does that mean that Nancy O'Beirne was rich in land, building and full of life? No, I mean winning, blue-eyed maiden of scarcely eight years.

Granny O'Beirne, as the neighbors called her, was a small, tidy, elderly woman, who had passed her three-score years, but was still able and willing to work. Indeed, it was her strong hands that kept the potato patch in order, tended the pig, cared for the two children, and made the house as clean as clay floors and sod can ever be.

It was coming on the winter—that is, it was already autumn—and the beautiful days were growing shorter, and the nights long or and more chilly. It was feared that it was going to be a hard winter for the poor, and the shadow of care darkened poor Nancy's door, as it had often done, but it left no corresponding show upon her face. As it began to be whispered the O'Beirne were in want, there came a lady from the Castle one morning to ask about their needs. Granny was sitting by the peat fire, clean and neat—as new pin, is one her own words, with a little shawl over her shoulders, just to keep out the cold.

"Good-morning, Nancy," said Mrs. Preston, kindly.

"Good-morning, ma'am" said Nancy, rising with old-fashioned Irish politeness and courtesying to her.

"Sit down, sit down, Nancy," said the lady to Dan.

"Is anybody ill, ma'am?" said Nancy, with a smile that made her wrinkled face quite so lock upon. "Thanks be to God, we have my health and strength, and the two little ones as fine children as there's in the country."

"Then I say 'tis badly off," Nancy," said the lady, "I mean that perhaps you have not all you require for yourself and children this winter."

"Well, ma'am," said Nancy, slowly, while a cloud came to her face, "we have a little, 'tis not to say that I have much put by me now."

"Have you anything, Nancy?" said the visitor.

Nancy took up the corner of her apron, shaped into a handkerchief, and said:

"If I'm put to it, ma'am, I may as well tell you that my little patch of potatoes failed, I'm sore pressed enough for my rent and the bit and sup for the children. But I'm not complaining," she said, hastily; "God has been good to me that it would be lying in Hades to say otherwise."

The visitor looked around. She had never known such thankfulness in the homes of the rich.

"You must let me help you, Nancy," she said.

A red spot came up into either of the withered old cheeks, and Nancy spoke it was in a low, subdued voice that touched Mrs. Preston deeply.

"For the sake of the little ones," she said, "I'll not say no, but I'd rather help never or one of my people on either side before was forced to take charity from the gentry. God forgive me," she continued, correcting herself quickly; "it's a false and foolish pride to call that charity, when God sends you Mrs. Preston, with your kindly face, to bring us relief."

When granny had consented thus far, Mrs. Preston began to inquire more particularly into her condition. To her surprise, she found there was neither food nor drink of any kind in the house, and but for her visit the children and their good grandmother would have gone supperless to bed, and yet Nancy had not only expressing her anti-sinfulness, Nancy said

"Sure, ma, ma'am, 'tis a providence has never let us want. When it came to the worst, something always turned up. And I knew it would this time, too, only that at first it went against me a little that I should come in the way of charity."

"Nancy," said Mrs. Preston, "how is it you are always cheerful? Have you never had any troubles?"

"None greater than my strength could bear," she said, with her patient, trusting smile, "I was married young, and I had my share of the crosses of life. I was a widow at five-and-twenty, and then I had my two children—two boys and four girls—all in the churchyard. Two of my boys—the old one I sent to America, and he's as going to be bad, like, out there, where, God forgive me, I'm sometimes afraid, Mahon and the goodness of God, he came home to me, just in time to die. And when I had him in the earth, with the blessing of the priest over him, I thought that for his mercy. My girls died of decline, one after another, and my youngest boy was taken down with the fever and followed them. But he left me his two little children, to be my story, ma'am and God bless him, he's a good boy, and you can see for yourself I have great cause to be thankful and to derive a complaining spirit far from me."

The lady looked sharply at Nancy. At first it almost seemed to her she must be jesting about her cause for thankfulness, after having known such terrible sorrow, though indeed she didn't guess at that the story had not all—the long struggle the heavy old soul had gone through to keep the two little ones from starvation, and ever since, the courage of a lion. Now, looking at the sweet face, with its humble, grateful tone, as to God, Mrs. Preston was silenced. Were she offered to provide Nancy with all that she could need during the winter, the old woman stopped her.

"I hope you'll not take it ill, Mrs. Preston, ma'am, but I'll ask you to give me only what I need at the present moment, and no more. For, don't you see, ma'am dear, if I were to take from you all that I could manage this and spring, it would like in distracting the mercy of God and being afraid to trust in him."

The lady could not speak. She turned down to hide a tear. Just then there was a rush of little feet and the the clatter of heavy shoes, and in came two barefooted, ragged little ones, pausing just inside the door, and dropping a courtesy, when they saw the stranger.

"There's Dan and Eily," said the old woman, laying a hand on the head of each: "and now you can see for yourself, ma'am, God's been good to me."

They made a pretty picture, despite some mud-stains on their hands and clothing. Dan had a bright, fearless look, and honest, dark eyes that met yours with more than ordinary childish candor. Eily was fair and timid and gentle, drawing back now and then behind her grandmother and glancing, shyly at the lady, holding in her tiny fingers the white a handful of wild flowers. After various advances from Mrs. Preston and remonstrances from Nancy, the children began to get over their shyness. Little Eily even approached the visitor and held up to her the bench of flowers.

"Oh! thank you, my dear, they are so pretty," said Mrs. Preston. "Do you know the names of them?"

"Sure I don't ma'am," said the child, "but maybe Dan does."

The visitor smiled at this instance of familiar reliance upon a brother's wisdom.

"Can you tell me, my little man?" said the lady to Dan.

"I wouldn't be very hard," said Dan, with comical gravity, "if I didn't put for get the name of them."

The lady laughed outright.

"They are not half so pretty," said Eily, as them was used to get in May for the Blessed Virgin's altar."

"Sure, granny'll tell you herself."

"Nonsense in the name of them, Dan, masquerade," said the old woman smiling, in a little harsh, though more, perhaps, in answer to her visitor's smile, than because she saw any humor in the child's odd way of putting a request.

"Granny," said Eily, suddenly, "we're both hungry. Dan and me. But we'll have to wait until supper-time. Maybe I could eat, but Dan's very hungry."

"If you were to ask Him, Granny," said Dan, "maybe God would send us some bread this night."

The lady looked inquiringly at Nancy. She smiled sobbly, and said

"I told them, ma'am, that God would not than go supperless to bed another night. They take my word for it, but the creatures are beginning to think it's a long time till morning."

The lady rose to go. She kissed the children, and left a bright piece of money in each of their hands. When she had gone, Dan stole softly up to his grandmother.

"Granny," said he, "do you mind the story that Nellie Carroll told us the other night, how the angels came to the cabin and left money that turned into dust again? Granny, this one won't turn into dust, will it?"

"Hush, marmeen" said the old woman, in alarm. "It's not safe at all times to talk about such things. Sure, God is able. But that money's as good as the best of it, if that gives it to you. God's blessing go with you."

"It was still early in the day, when a man appeared at the cabin door with a basket from the Castle. So the children did not go supperless to bed then, nor for many a day after.

"The long, hard winter had passed away, and Mrs. Preston, who had been in England, came back again to Ireland in the spring, and her first thought was of Nancy O'Beirne. One lovely spring afternoon she walked down the village, on her way to the cabin. The church was open, and Mrs Preston was about to go in to say a little prayer and spend a few minutes before Our Lord in the tabernacle, when she met Nancy, leading little Eily by the hand. The old woman had the same cheerful, patient look as ever, but the lady fancied that the wrinkled face, framed by the close white cap, had a shadow in it, somewhere, that she had not noticed before. She stopped at once and spoke.

"Well, Nancy," she said, "how are you? I have often thought of you, though far away."

"Aye, and God ever bless you for the bounty that brought us through the long days of this winter!" said Nancy.

"Do not speak of that, Nancy, and the lady. "But my friend Dan is not with you. How is he?"

"Well, ma'am," said Nancy, with a troubling sobsingly, "I hope he's well, and better off than my poor efforts could have provided him."

"What" cried the lady, shocked: "you mean to say he is not—"

"That he's dead, ma'am," said the old woman, "and lying there, with the rest of them that's gone, God rest their souls."

She made a little gesture, as she spoke, towards the churchyard. Tears of real sorrow flowed down the lady's cheeks.

"Don't cry ma'am, dear," said old Nancy, wiping away a tear herself with the corner of a checked apron, "when we know that he's this minute before the face of God, a year and lose of the heavens merriest."

"Work, Work, Work!"

How many women there are working in the various branches of industry—to say nothing of the thousands of private women whose lives are an unending round of toil—who are martyrs to their compulsory toil, which the weaker sex is liable. Their tasks are rendered double hard and irksome and their lives shortened, yet hitherto scarcely anyone thought to lend a helping hand. To such Dr. Harvey's "Favorite Prescription" offers a substantial relief. For all female weaknesses it is a certain cure. Of druggists.

Hostetter's Anti Phosphate Is Delicious. Dr. W. Hoadley, New Orleans, La., says: "I found it an admirable remedy for debilitated state of the system, produced by the wear and tear of the nervous energies."

THE BRIDES OF CHRIST.

A Day in London with the Sisters of the Assumption.

The quiet, black robed nuns, moving swiftly along the streets in all parts of London, but chiefly in the poorer districts, have long ago ceased to attract the curious attention of the passers-by. They come and go, with their little companions, laden with mysterious parcels and packages, more or less, always carrying their small hands lid-deep under the wide sleeves of their coarse garments. They seem to be cut on some urgent errand. Few of the thousands who meet them pass by them with a curiosity greater than any but the fastest of the world's idle dreams really is. If they know is that she is a nun, a convent, a convent of Mercy, or a convent of Poor Clares, or a convent of Sisters of Charity, for "Sisterhood" stands high on the banner which floats behind the coach of the Bishop of London, or other, or, there is an air of loving sympathy with the poor, of tender patience, about them all, which calls forth the sympathetic and respect of all who come in contact with them.

Early—at least early morning—the Little Sister begins her day's work. Perhaps it is poor—so poor, indeed, that her breakfast is but a crust, and a cup of cold water, and a crust of bread, and a cup of cold water, and a crust of bread, and a cup of cold water, and a crust of bread

MISSION OF THE CATHOLIC PRESS.

"Journalism is the most social power, because it is the chief agent in propagating ideas, and properly speaking, it constitutes the medium of all intellectual life. Accordingly, the Catholic press is scattered throughout the world. In our view, Catholic journalism is not a mere business enterprise, nor only a work intelligible to the authors of another, but a part of apostolic labors. What is our what might be the object of Catholic journalism? It is to defend religious truth, to diffuse it by every means, and to make it triumph. Journalism is a power, and a power which is to be directed to the service of God and His Church, for the salvation of souls." Pius IX.

"By this journalism, which is the most powerful of all, Princes do Rome, under whose protection they work, and Bishops, who are the Pontiffs' delegates, and priests, or rather, the captain and those of the Holy Ghost, are enabled to be doctrine and propagate the Catholic and fidelity—Pius IX.

Editorial Notes.

—His Holiness Pope Leo XIII., has been pleased to declare St. Vincent de Paul patron of all the charitable institutions existing throughout the entire Catholic world, as he had already, in 1882, proclaimed the same great Saint patron of the works of charity instituted in France.

—A telegram from Berlin to the Moniteur de Rome states that the illustrious German Professor Frantz, who occupies the Chair of History in the new Catholic University, with an annual salary of $10,000, preferring to pursue his historic studies in his native land.

—Rt. Rev. Richard Phelan, recently nominated as Coadjutor Bishop of Pittsburgh, is a native of County Kilkenny, Ireland, where he was born 57 years ago. He came to this country in 1849, studied for the priesthood, was ordained in 1854, and has since served in different parishes of Pennsylvania. His consecration is set for the 10th of next month—feast of St. Lawrence.

—So many more children have been added to the attendance at Father McNally's schools in St. Patrick's Parish, West Oakland, that the zealous pastor is making preparations to build another school house 60x75 feet in dimensions. The people of St. Patrick's Parish are certainly "wise in their generation" and they will raise children who will be an honor to their Church, a credit to their country, and prove themselves pearls of Christianity.

—Somebody has said, what everybody has observed, that those persons who have attained to eminence in any vocation of life have followed a uniform course, that of earnest work and unwearied application. None are truly happy but those that are busy; for the only real happiness lies in useful work of some kind, either of the hand or the mind, and so long as ever strong of either is avoided. It should be the aim of every one to be employed. If all men and women were kept at some useful employment, there would be less sorrow and wickedness in the world.

—Parents who quarrel, curse and swear, lead irreligious and ungodly lives, must not Justice demands a day of reckoning for their negligence. Not alone do they destroy their own happiness by ever-recurrence, but their daughters, "comely and modest and unattractive, and the children are driven to seek recreation in the variety show or with evil companions, where they learn to become burdens to themselves and to the community.

—The sermon preached by Rev. M. Dyer, of St. Vincent's College, Los Angeles, at the dedication of the new St. Vincent's Hospital in that city, shows birth to truthful terms the devotion of the Daughters of St. Vincent de Paul in all the onerous duties undertaken upon them. What Father Dyer said of the Sisters of Charity of Los Angeles holds true concerning every individual member of that holy community throughout the civilized world. Their voluntary labor for the sick poor is one of the grand proofs that the Church of God is of Divine origin, as no "Brotherhood" have phase within her pale.

—The easy manner in which some people are hoodwinked by bogus "Bishops" of bogus religious sects, is actually both amazing and amusing. Finding that "hard times" was depleting his treasury, the notorious "Bishop" McNamara, of New York—the founder of the so-called "Independent" Catholicism, organized a "pilgrimage" recently to the High Bridge at Harlem, where his "immediate" a number of his "Independent" brigade in the river, first going through the farce of emptying into the Hudson river a basketful of what that unscrupulous old sinner called "water from the river Jordan." How people can be duped by such scalawags is one of the things that passes human comprehension.

—It begins to look as if the labors of the National Home Rule League were about to be crowned with victory. Our Irish correspondent gives a very cheerful view of Irish political affairs this week, and in a private letter a leader of the Monitor in Galway—who is both a priest and a patriot—gives us the cheering assurance that "Parnell is very near his victory and has the outpoints of the enemy already in his possession." It is also a hopeful sign to see the Dublin Corporation refusing to present a fulsome address filled with "loyalty" to the new Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and the same body has selected that gifted and sterling patriot T. D. Sullivan for Lord Mayor of this Irish capital. These are tangible proofs of the triumph of Irish principles when practically applied to English morals in Ireland.

—The Catholic young men of this city deserve great commendation for the zeal they have manifested in the establishment and increase of Catholic societies for themselves, under the approbation of Church authority. In this age of co-operative, beneficial and social organizations, Catholics should participate for the purpose of preserving that bond of unity which should be far stronger among those of one faith than among those without such a heavenly bond of brotherhood. The hope, therefore, that hundreds of our Catholic young men will become members of some society suitable to their tastes, and a list of which will be found every week on our sixth page.

—The North American College at Rome celebrated the installation of its new rector, Rev. Dr. O'Connell, of Richmond, Va., by a grand literary, musical and social entertainment. Among the invited guests were Bishop Danager and Monsignor Mooney. At the close of the entertainment the whole company sang the "Star Spangled Banner."

The Episcopal committee of the Irish Hierarchy have issued a manifesto demanding a fair share of the endowments granted by the Government for educational purposes. The manifesto is couched in polite but firm language, and contains some sharp strictures on the former appointment of those endowments. It urges the Parnellite members of Parliament to oppose with every means within their power the grants to the Queen's Colleges that may come before the House of Commons until the Government complies with the committee's demand.

—The Rome papers state that the Public Consistory was to take place on Thursday, the 23th inst. Among the Prelates to be present in caps and receive the Red Hat were Bishop and Title. The Holy Father has expressed his intention to depute his Eminence Cardinal Moran to "confer episcopal consecration upon Dr. Walsh, the Archbishop elect of Dublin, which ceremony was to be performed in the Eternal City shortly after the Consistory.

—During the celebration, recently, of a special festival, in the Cathedral at Cuernavaca, Mexico, a band of thieves conspired to extinguish the electric lights in the sacred edifice, and taks advantage of the confusion and darkness to rob the people assembled there. The leader of the gang threw a wire over the electric light wire with the intention of drawing it down and opening the circuit; but some other ground permitted the electricity to pass through his body killing him instantly, and serving as a terrible example in wait for one about to commit the crime of sacrilege. The members of the gang made good their escape in the confusion caused by the tragic death of their leader.

—To the mother-house of the Sisters of Charity, of the West, near Cincinnati, Ohio, was destroyed by fire, on the 16th. The Sisters were out on the grounds, at recreation, and were startled by an explosion supposed to be gasoline. Rushing into the house it was found filled with smoke, and but little was saved beside the chapel furniture. The building and the clothing of the Sisterhood are a total loss. The structure was rededicated by Archbishop Elder, in 1884. It cost $75,000, on which there is an insurance of $30,000. Many Sisters and women were kept at some useful employment, there would be less sorrow and wickedness in the world.

—The controversy about the authorship of the Pentateuch is still going on. On the other hand, Father Hummelauer, a learned Dominican employed in the Archives of the Vatican, has, according to the Abbe Darlapon, "conclusively established the legend of Gareon, the mythical Abbot of Saint Etienne, at Vernoil, "Father Santini, General of the Regular Canons of the Laterna, has published a volume of some 500 pages in favor of the claim of Thomas a Kempis; and one of the Canons, Father Lelli, has written two pamphlets to the same effect. Finally, the Abbe Dulvigne has protested, in a little pamphlet published at Brussels, against the monument to Vercoil.

—The new Viceroy of Ireland has Catholic family connections in Germany as well as in England. His great-great-grandmother, who died in 1796, was a Catholic princess, Franz Anton Tavis, Archprinst of Aix-la-Chappelle, whose sister, Catherine Elizabeth Tavis, married William Herbert, and became mother of the first Earl of Carnarvon, Henry Herbert. The present Lord Carnarvon, says the Germania, erected about twenty years ago a tablet in the Church of the Holy Cross in the Cathedral of Aix-la-Chapelle, to the memory of the Archprincess Tavis, above mentioned. The inscription on the tablet concludes with these words:

Hanrion Howard Molyneux Herbert
Comes de Carnarvon
Germanice Avunculi Carissimi Posuit Anglorum Moerens.

—There is a certain class of disreputable people who rush into print under some nom de plume so as to hide their freedom falsehoods and their filthy characters from the gaze of the world. The literary garbage of such scavengers is generally dumped into the columns of anti Catholic papers, which are the favored receptacle of all the refuse of chaff ruffians who have no record whatever for truth, and whose positions are so thoughtless as to depute his Eminence Cardinal Moran to "confer episcopal consecration upon Dr. Walsh, the Archbishop elect of Dublin, which ceremony was to be performed in the Eternal City shortly after the Consistory.

The Catholic Schools of the California Province.

Now that the Catholic schools of this State, Nevada and Utah are preparing to reopen their doors for the coming year's scholars, we desire particularly to call the attention of Catholic parents to the facilities which exist within this Province by which a thorough Christian education can be procured for their children.

It is with considerable satisfaction that we can point to the Principals of Catholic schools where studies have already been resumed, that the attendance of scholars in nearly every instance has come to our knowledge—has been increased, thus showing that Catholic parents are becoming more familiar with the immense advantages and spiritual superiority which the Catholic system presents for Catholics over that system which plants in the soil of children a hate of the faith of their parents.

In sending our children to Catholic schools we prove ourselves obedient to the mandate of Almighty God, who says: "Suffer the little children to come unto Me, and forbid them not. For of such is the kingdom of God." Every child that attends a Catholic school goes to the sanctuary of God, and thus is prepared to become one heir of the kingdom of Heaven. And the Catholic parent who allows his children to attend other schools—Catholic schools where Catholic prayers are not permitted, where Catholic piety is forbidden, where Catholic practices are scoff'd and sneered at—what does he do? He kills the Christian seed planted by Almighty God in that innocent soul; he makes an apostate out of an angel; and he annihilates every virtuous impulse which the child's soul has received from its Creator! Sad, and indeed, will be the fate of such recreant Catholic parents when called up before the judgment seat of God to give an account of the souls of those children which were given them.

If—though the willful neglect of Catholic parents—the souls of their children are lost because they have not received an education comprising a knowledge of God and His Church—it is almost a certainty that the vengeance of God will doom that parent to everlasting punishment. A single act of pride lost heaven to the angels, what then must be the doom of those who rebel against God themselves and rob him of those souls entrusted to them so that His Church militant might have warriors and virgins, and His Church triumphant might have saints?

Almighty God designs great things for every child baptized in His Church, but the Catholic parent who willfully sends his child to those schools where a knowledge of God is a lost art, stands between the designs of God and his own child's salvation. What a monster, then, that man must be in the eye of God who thus secures to himself the power to thwart the will of an Omnipotent Creator! Every Catholic parent must feel that to assume such a responsibility is one of the greatest follies any human being could perpetrate. Yet this is precisely the attitude assumed by those Catholic parents who send their children to anti-Catholic academies in places where Catholic services are not even thought of, and where their forebears died for, they swear it is "the superstition of past ages. The Mass is merely "popish mummery" in their enlightened imaginations. The Sacraments instituted by Christ they look upon as so many useless ceremonies conceived by priests in order to become the opulent and idle; their children unbaptized and called by names unknown to any saint in heaven. And thus they—the children of so called Catholic parents—and all their future posterity, become apostates to God's Church and are lost forever from the flock of the Good Shepherd!

What must be the harrowed feelings of the Catholic father and the Catholic mother as they reflect that upon their souls rests the responsibility for this terrible downfall and desolation! Too late they have awakened to the knowledge that the seed planted in the souls of their children by anti-Catholic or non-Catholic education has placed therein the noxious weeds of the world where Almighty God designed should be a parterre of the flowers of every virtue in Paradise. Here, in this province of Catholic parents are of no avail. Express are useless, and thus from one knows at their trials until they descend into the grave and render their unhappy souls into the hands of that God who has said: "Bring up your children in the discipline and correction of the Lord."

Happily for the Catholic parents in California, Catholic schools abound in almost every portion of it, and renowned efforts are made almost monthly to open Catholic schools in regions not already provided. These schools are as good as those under non-Catholic management, in all that pertains to secular education, and far superior to them in the advantage they offer for the preservation of the faith implanted by the Almighty God in the guileless souls of Catholic children. Hence these schools not only develop the mental qualities of the minds of their pupils, but they also impart to them a love for God, a veneration for His Blessed Mother and His Saints, as well as a desire to be like unto them, pure, virtuous, truthful, honest children, and thus become the delight, the staff and the comfort of their parents in their declining years.

So that Catholic parents may select the most suitable Catholic school adjacent to their place of abode, we append a list of Catholic schools in this Province, which, although it may not be entirely complete, will give to those or those outside of this section of the Pacific coast what has already been accomplished for Christian education

Deceit Practiced by Protestant Propagandists.

Time and again we have exposed the dishonest means adopted by the Protestant sects in order to decoy or to coerce Catholics into subscribing money by means of which it was proclaimed that Christianity was to be spread throughout the world. The money thus secured has hitherto been generally put into the pockets of the petty larceny preachers who practiced this kind of robbery under the cloak of religion. While the poor victims of misplaced confidence were flattering themselves that their thousands of dollars were directing immortal souls to heaven, they—benighted pagans—were being the high road to hell, each with a gilt bible in his hand.

The biblical sects have hitherto manifested a great deal of brag and bluster concerning the "vast progress" which that religious community known as "Old Catholicism" was making in Europe, especially in Germany. But—unfortunately for the fanatical fund-collecting parasites—a Priest named Reinkens, D.D., Bishop of London, has let the sectarian cat out of the cosy bag, and exposed the whole "Old Catholic" movement to be nothing more than a mere handful of rich rascals who found the Catholic religion too stringent for their secular life, and thus they went into a sectarian camp where they could get rent to their vicious habits. The Letter to Protestant papers, and ends for your sectarian brag concerning the "Old Catholics." Here is the document of doom

*Sir,—*In reply to your note that you, as a clergyman of the Church of England, would not be willing to willingly publish wrong statements, you ask for donations or subscriptions for the Old Catholics in Germany, I feel bound, without believing it to be a case of wilful lying, to inform you that the number of about 50,000 of the so-called Old Catholics never approached the figure quoted, that their ever second, Doctor Reinkens as their Bishop, and had not conferred by the ecclesiastical Bishop of Rome, without giving notice to the Pope. Dr. Dollinger, the Bishop, and many others, have warned their friends not to have anything to do with some of them, and shunned them.

The Roman Catholics have in no single instance presented the members, or even the ministry, where the Old Catholics, the Roman Catholic affiliate, remained temporary chapels to accommodate their thousands of faithful, whilst the few dozen adherents of Dr Reinkens have taken active in the four large temples—Rome, Brooklyn and Wiesbaden—stolen from them.

The Government, far from treating the Old Catholics kindly, has shown them the same cold shoulder, acted on the very beginning of the movement, and, as I have said, has not even conferred with Dr. Reinkens. Prussia has spoken one minister by which the Government has made a world wide blunder. Thus through spite on account of the anti-Catholic spirit,

Farm and Home.

Recreation for Wives and Housekeepers.

How many women we see day after day who seem to labor at their duties in life, who act about their duties in a mechanical sort of a way, as much as to say, I have so much to do and must get it done, and pass through to end and get it over, and, although in so quiet a manner as possible, with their's is something radically wrong with such a woman. I know that doing the same thing over and over, day after day, is apt to become very monotonous, unless the mind is diverted some in a while by other things. A wall, a rile, a single spot of some place of amusement, or in social pleasure, will freshen the jaded faculties wonderfully, and you will return to your pots and pans with new zest. Anything rather than be enslaved in a few rooms, no matter how pleasant they may be. All women know how wearing the duties of wife and mother are, and unless some rest, some diversion is taken once in a while, the incessant labor and worry will soon break her down. And yet I have heard women who have large families and no one to help them say that sometimes two or three weeks slipped before they go out. Now this is not right. No one can be a good woman, no matter how sweet-tempered she may have been, if her mind become morbid and fretful. The husband is very fortunate, and, mind he is a man, whose wife, who is looking as you think, solely, prepares a walk or a street-car ride, and take the children with her if you can't do any better; or hire some trusty person to come in and take care of the little ones for a morning, and take her out and you will see how the will brighten up, and the effect of that evening's pleasure will last for some time. Men who are out every day do not realize how confined a life a laborious loving woman to stay at home, or how great an undertaking it is to go out with three or four babies. Husbands, as a rule, are not home hearted; they do not see that monotony is a pang for fresh air and amusement; or at pining for fresh air and sunshine; that the drudgery of every day life is wearing her out; they do not see that worry of the little ones is nearly turning her brain. If they fully realized it they would spend a little more money for that same trusty person mentioned above, and at least once a week the partner of their joys and sorrows should have a real good time, some hing like she used to have when they were first married and without care. The need of recreation cannot be too highly valued by both mothers and fathers. The wife will take more interest in household labors, and the husband will see a more beautiful face when he comes home at night. Change is rest, and one will soon become tired of life if there is no break in the monotony of every-day work.

Religion at Home.

It is laughable to see one hunting high and low for his spectacles when they have been only shoved over his forehead. It is not laughable to see Christians hunting for what they call opportunities to honor God, while overlooking such opportunities which they carry with them wherever they go. A shovelly carpenter was once heard at a weekly prayer meeting to pray with great fervency for the spread of Christ's cause—a cause which he disgraced and hindered in his sphere every time he stood at his work-bench. When he ended his prayer, a hearty "Amen" came from a server who put his apron over his head for a hundred times a day by his carelessness. A short also was there, who, although he taught a class in the mission school on Sunday, was a big liar and a cheat in his business. Whosoever rose with his diagnosed

ST. VINCENT'S DAY IN LOS ANGELES.

Dedication of a New Hospital, Sermons and Services on the Occasion.

Last Sunday being the feast of St. Vincent de Paul, founder of the order of the Sisters of Charity, the new hospital erected by the Sisters was solemnly dedicated. Besides the Sisters of Charity now, there are about 100 Sisters of Charity in the city, the orphans have left the Asylum on the Mission and are in charge of the beautiful institute as soon as could settled. The hospital was begun in 1884, and cost $40,000, of which the Sisters have paid about $4,000 on the balance. It was begun at 10 o'clock, the celebrant being the Rev. A. J. Meyer, assisted by the Revs. J. Ganley and T. J. Cooney as Deacon and Subdeacon, Master of Ceremonies, Rev. J. Caballeria, and A. Thuriet, student of St. Vincent's College, sang the Mass, the Sisters participate and robes were on the occasion. The Very Rev. Vicar General, Brother Gonzalo, was rendered by the children of the Sisters' School. After the Gospel of the Mass was delivered by the Rev. M. Myer, of St. Vincent's College, from the text: "Be merciful, as your Father is merciful, but the mercy of God is open all flesh—Joel.

These words taken from the 14th Ecel. are supposed by the Church to be read in the office of St. Vincent, whose feast we celebrate to-day. Not only could he be found more appropriate to the occasion which our Saint's life touches. He was a divine life and heroic practice of the divine traits. In God the Psalmist assures us mercy is nothing in itself, nothing, but a manifestation of His mercy. God's mercy, says David, consists in all His works. And to the inquiry, why is God distinguished from man, from all things, the answer is, because God is merciful in towards his children. Mercy is the attribute of God, and this St. Vincent possessed in a high degree. The Church by God's mercy is now all powerful, and is engaged in repeating the passage of scripture, "Behold the tabernacle of God with men." The Church is universal patron of all the saints, but Saint from all others more particularly in mercy to God. I need not to enumerate his life, it ought to be well known and familiar to all you who have his children among you. But the day, the place and the occasion invite us to recall and dwell upon the works of compassion, which were so much like to his mercy of God, that they were called all saints blind, all suffering humanity. To the degree and extent to which any one is compassionate and brought near to God is he compassionate and merciful towards his fellow creatures. Mercy is the most and most fundamental virtue. Upon it rests the whole Christian life. Jesus Christ, the Son of God, is the Christ, the Son of God, is the Christ, the Son of God, is the

ST. VINCENT'S DAY IN ANGELES.

Dedication of a New Hospital, Sorrowful Harvesters in the Colonies.

Last Sunday being the feast of St. Vincent, founder of the order of the Sisters of Charity, the new hospital recently built by them, formerly dedicated. Besides the officials of the city, the orphan girls from the city of Angeles, the Knights of Columbus, the Alameda Guards, a company under Capt. Ward, being present in full, one of the largest being round for the occasion.

At 10 o'clock, the celebrant, Rev. J. A. Hagerty, assisted by Rev. Fathers T. J. Toomey as Deacon, Dwyer as Subdeacon, M. Lasseigne, J. L. Lee, and Thorel, students of St. Charles College, carried in the procession vestments on the occasion were from Rome, and cost $1,000. The music was rendered by the Sisters' School. Father of the Mass.

THE SERMON

was delivered by the Rev. M. Dyer, of Santa Cruz, from the text: "The man who is towards his neighbor, is made God to you all flesh—Eccl. 18.

These words taken from the text delivered by the Church to celebrate the feast of St. Vincent, who for a long time Not could work out for himself what our Saviour's Spirit and divine life and heart portrays. Christ, in God the Father, there is another in great and holy as in His mercy. God's mercy, says the Holy Writ, Ecclesiastes, and is distinguished from man, from all this mankind. Man's compassion is for his neighbor, God's mercy is all flesh. It is God's mercy to man all flesh. Man's compassion is for his neighbor. Man's compassion is for his neighbor. Man's compassion is for his neighbor

MISSION OF THE CATHOLIC PRESS.

"Journalism is the greatest social power, because it is the chief agent in populating land, and peopling the world with the creatures of its own creative power. It, our close, religious press is either a useful and serious occupation, not only a work instilling principles into the minds of others, but a work of salvation. What is and what ought to be the mission of the Catholic press? Its mission is to be the Catholic Thermopylae against the Mahometan invasion of Christian Truth, Christian Morality, Christian Culture.

"By this Mission we understand that the Journalism of the Catholic Press is to be the Catholic Thermopylae against the Mahometan invasion of Christian Truth, Christian Morality, Christian Culture, and that it

ST. VINCENT'S DAY IN ANGELES.

Dedication of a New Hospital.—Sacred Services on the Occasion.

Last Sunday being the feast of St. Vincent de Paul, founder of the order of the Sisters by, the new hospital erected by the Sisters recently dedicated. Besides the officials of the Church, there were present all the people of the city, the orphan girls from the Mission, and a large number of friends. The patients in many of the wards of the hospital being able to be present on the last long, we, with the exception of the Sisters, the assembled at 10 o'clock, the celebrant Rev. A. J. Mayer, assisted by the Rev. Landry and T. J. Cooney as Deacon Assistant, Master, Ed. Linnerty, D. Lynch and A. Thorst, students of St. College, served at the time. The choir rubes were on the occasion were from Saga Chapel. The music was sung by children of the Sisters' School. Author of the Mass.

THE SERMON

was delivered by the Rev. M. Dyer, of conn's College, from the text: The cose is towards his spouse, but the God is upon all flesh—Zeno.

These words taken from the 19th Ecclesiastes by the Church to be read in St. Vincent, who he found occasion to celebrate. Not could words be found more apt than those which our Saint's life illustrates life and honor perfect ness of truth. To God the Psalmist says, is nothing so great nothing so His mercy. God's mercy, says the all His works. And in the longest distinguished from man, from all this this attribute. Man's mercy is

But the day, the mission invite us to recall and view works of compassion, which were or the mercy of God, since the year 1845, killed, all enforcing humanity. To the years to which God was in raised brought one to God is be compassionate, and manifest the mercy of God, humanity and compassionate. Let us of so noble a character, which so many of the humanity and the mercy of God, by the Church and illustrated by the noble children. Established in the how great and wonderful, how divi God is Father. Venerable Bede, in parentage, without friend or palace and a shrine, and put in beneath the guardian, and savior of every pa the Church, and the Church, the universal family of God. The poor, the orphan, the fatherless, the widow, the sick and paralytic, the blind, the famine and pestilence were all shelter and tender compassion and God's infinite providence and savior.

was above mere human capacity; must we think of have agreed to our tribute liberally towards making the fair a success, but there don't seem to be much wealthy citizens, hence the movement points to failure.

Since my last comes notice to the Mission Dolores, Rev. Father Lagan, the pastor, has been very ill, but is now improving, and hopes to be able to be present on the 16th inst. Keenan and Lynch are in the fingers of God, and one hope increased and strengthened and more of the Lord is not shortened. Nine years with his life. Keenan and Lynch and misery were as old as the earth, as long as mankind dwelt on the earth, with all its sorrows and its joys, the need for the manifestation of it provided, through permanent institutions, which should be perpetuated as the most distinctive in the remedy approving his beneficent purpose, man his servant by furnishing him compish his heart's desires. The in and life worth, and the hearts prove them to be have for God in the Vincent, visibly in favor of St. Vincent. Visibly in the institutions which are found, or in, our great and blessed Vincent, or, and service, as the great work, the work of charity, and the work of the Church, our children spoke the treasure we have in our Vincent.

In conclusion, I would say, it is a real ornament, public spirit, which place of the city, and the Sisters of Charity, and the public like it? Is there no one in this hospital, to invite visitors as affording ample and generous and no less unpretentious.

COMPLETENESS, BEAUTY AND

It is unquestionable by even the Personally I have visited and be Hospitals in the East and in Europe, of them, except in size, one more of many other hospitals, and there selected, when purchase price and variety of session. But this is unlikelous and commodious park presenting very favorable comparison of as hospital. Patients need pur accomodations and pleasantness and in our fair city do these possess as in this hospital. Its rooms will the pure mountain or ocean breezes unmatchable and the grounds, improvements, and the ground, through ment, delight and nothing. No or, cast, or almost any other, hospital disturb its quietude. To the the shortest service, the I work will all find here the most comfortable for their early, rapid restoration. But of the outward and the approach I need not speak for themselves more eloquently Inadmission or a Cicero. Like life grandeur, that I for all. CARE, ASTUTEN AND MISTRI

Father Niezel, the superior of the Trappists, arrived from France, where he went to select French Catholics for their colonization, and incidentally remark that there is plenty of resource which is still and ever will be shown by the great Church of the Sacred Heart Father Niezel and his brethren who were at Mount Tabor, Palestine, have sought refuge at Safed, in Syria, but have set themselves to work to clear a tract of ground for a farm, which is very fertile, and which is free from fever and less poisonous spring. Father Niezel says that the Trappists have made their rule with vegetables, and thinks that for having given them the privilege of selling their products in the neighboring towns, they will make a good return to the spirit of their rule, and will be satisfied that the Government will be the means of bringing to their prayer seven more souls than they have lost souls. He says that the Underwood Trappists are the French Jesuits and Sisters of Charity, and that the people in Paris for civil and military assistance, and that the Government has

THE TOUCH OF A MOTHER'S HAND.

"You may go now and sit by his bed,
Stay tenderly by his side;
Do not disturb him, the doctor has said,
It may be death if you break his sleep."

"I will keep most still—you can trust me so;
I can scarce bear to see him at rest,
Don't think one startled—your kindness I know,
God will reward you for what you have done."

She passed through the ward; and jokes and taints,
And murmurs and cries of anguish, cease;
And there came a calm, such as falls on saints,
When an angel passes on errands of peace.

Many a dying one, as she passed,
Pr'ahed her lonely lifted his head,
And she came where a young sailor lay, at last,
And she knelt down quietly by his bed.

He was only a boy, wounded and weak;
And one nestled gently down, in truth,
Whether the reality lent on his cheek
Was the fever flush or the flush of youth.

A shot lodged by his side, on the cabin floor,
His spoke in his dreams to an absent one;
"Lily, I will come back one more,
And we will be wed when the war is done."

Her hand on his forehead, nathinking, she laid,
As he fevered and moaned, she gently fanned;
And the dying soldier, awaking, said,
"That touch like the touch of my mother's hand."

Then around the ward his eyes wildly rose,
"Tell them I died on the battle-field for them—Mother!" "My child!" "I knew you would come!"
And she clasped her boy in a fond embrace.

"And as the remnant of life ebb'd away,
When I can open your hand hold her fast—
Tell her to think of me on many Mother! I will not let you be forgot.

"A moment since, I was dreaming of home;
A cool shade on me, I lay down to rest,
And I thought to my bedside that you had come
And kissed me, as you used to do when a child.

"I wake to find that my dream is true,
And that your mere presence is near me still;
My old, cold heart is warm with joy
To see your boy for a little while.

"I did not think that life had in store
For me such as rapture joy as this—
To feel the touch of your hand once more,
To feel on my brow once more your kiss.

"Turn your head on my fevered brow;
Kiss me again—I am growing cold;
Smile as of old—I am happy now;
Good-bye for awhile! I will go to sleep."

"Good-bye, good-bye! I am reconciled,"
And she thought—how, "'Tis hard to part;
Ah, do we blame those more, my child,
They have willing to do, and I will hard Sore." You, see, Tim, I was used to 'mother.'
"We took the kindest care of Adelaide, and I always remember that. You know how mother smoothes her dress, Tim, when she is saying something very particular. Well she smoothed her dress, stopped a little, and then said: "We can tie it by getting married, Mr. Marshall!"

"So she asked you, Uncle Tony?" said
Tim, opening his eyes very wide.

"Yes, Tim. I should never have thought of but one kind of marriage. Well, Tim,
I know that Sara must have a woman's care.
That decided me."

"You know, Tim, that mother means well, but at times is a little wearying."

"Yes, Uncle Tony, and she's pretty saric', sleepy."

"Just so, Tim. Well, she couldn't understand Sara, and as Sara grew older, mother wanted her to wash dishes, mend
the stockings and sew, and so, as she said, "do like other girls." Sara could no more do these things, Tim, than a lark could drive a plough. He should have seen her place herself up on my bench, Tim, and then heard her sigh! How she could sigh!
There never was another such throat!

"The answer was thrown in an Italian singer took apartments in the house.
Many mornings I used to lie in my bed and hear Sara sing. She was born to sing, Tim, and I'm sure she would have to sea she said she had gone away to study, and be a great singer; that she loved me better than all the world, and that she would come back to me, but dear little father—that was what she always called me, Tim—and make us happy and proud; and that I was to be a strong sister she as well as hard." The old man's voice had a sad little tremble in it as he added: "and that was ten years ago."

"And it was in New York, wasn't it?"

"Yes, Tim, Sara had been gone almost a year when we came.

"You found me in New York, didn't you, Uncle Tony?"

"Yes, Tim, fast asleep in a packing box, with your triangle in your hand."

"Do you believe, Uncle Tony, that I always like to have my triangle with me. It makes me feel kinder close to my people.
She used to sing to me kinder clear and warbly like, but so sweet! Sara was Ireland; and when I play my triangle, it seems as if I was hearin' her. She thought me the triangle, cause it was all she could afford; and I like music so. She took care of me real tender, Uncle Tony, as long as she lived."

"And when she died your drunken father got you in the street."

"Yes, and I am very glad he did. I he hadn't you wouldn't have found me.

So these two on whom the life of life had indeed fallen heavily, were should be content. It is only when misfortunes is mar-with sweetness and love that she is developed into happiest misery or one.

Gay were now the evenings in the cozy city. As they approached the theatre they found themselves remaining in the streets of the great, grimy, hurrying, never-silent city, the rolling tides of pale white faces and shadow made all things dimly beautiful.
Down the street, now inlight, now in shade,
Tim and Uncle Tony went slowly on their way, Uncle Tony taking a queer little back step at regular intervals, to keep himself in pace with Tim's halting gait.

"Uncle Tony," said Tim, looking up into the old man's face, "would you mind telling me how it all happened?"

"The old man hesitated a moment, and then said—

"Tim, I will tell you; but I must begin pretty well back, or you couldn't understand it."

"You see, Tim, my father was a musician by profession. He had great musical talent, and a touch of genius, just enough to make him ambitious, and he was never successful. He wanted me to keep away from the scene, but, Tim, I couldn't do it.
And I tell you, said the old man, growing quite emphatic, "I could play marvellously well in those days, for one who was a genius.

"I can remember that I told you that I played in the orchestra at Drury lane Theatre. Well, the great folks liked my playing, and some of them sent for me to come up to the West End almost every night while I was there, to play at the theatre.
It was in that way that I became acquainted with Adelaide, Sir William Norton's only daughter."

Uncle Tony's tone had been growing lower and lower, and now, with bent head, he walked on in silence until Tim said softly—

"Why, where is Adelaide now, Uncle
Tony?"

"Ah" said the old man, raising his head and lifting his rusty silk hat reverently
"she's an angel. Tim; an angel with folds these many years.

A few moments and he went on huskily—

"After a time, we stole away and were married.

"There never was a lovalier being, Tim, than she was." The old man sighed heartily and went on in silence until Tim said—

"Was she ever in America, Uncle Tony?"

"Yes," said he, running himself. "Yes.
When Sara was born. Adelaide called her Sara for her dead mother. When her father heard of it he wrote to us, and, in the letter, Tim, I remember every word of it—"You have insulted your lady mother's sainted memory by calling Anthony Marshall's daughter by her name. I will never look upon your face again, nor hear from you, if I can avoid it."

"He was a mean, hard one, wasn't he?"
said Tim, his brown eyes flashing indignation.

"I don't suppose he meant to be. I believe I am understand him it was, said the old man in his gentle, direct way.

"After this Adelaide grew more frail among day, and for the sun engage and the change, we came to America. She was batter at first, and then she failed in that fever spirit but imperceptible way which only victims of consumption feel, and growing more and more beautiful, Tim, with each succeeding day.

The old man dropped his head and did not speak again until someone, going in the opposite direction, shouldered roughly against him and roused him.

"It was then, Tim, that I learned to work on shoes. I only had what I earned by playing in the orchestra. You see there were no great folks in New York who wanted me to play for them.

"Ah, Tim, it is a great comfort to me to think that Adelaide never wanted for anything which money could buy, and that she never knew about the shoes.

"The old man spoke no more until Tim asked—

"And how was it about Sara, Uncle Tony?"

"After it was all over, said Uncle Tony, in a quiet, weary tone, "I could not play.
There is much in us, Tim, which may die out while we live on,—with a long sigh—
I have worked only at the shoes since.

He paused a moment and then continued—

"Mrs. Wicks—that was mother's name —lived in the house with us, and she looked after Sara and I. When Sara was ten years old, mother came in one morning, looking very sweet. After she had done everything she said—

"Mr. Marshall, you must get some one else to do what I have been doin' ever since your wife died, and before, too, for that matter. Not that I don't want the mother, or that I mind the work, but"—she stopped,
and I asked her what she meant. "Well," said she, "to tell you the unvarnished truth, Mr. Marshall, you are a widower,
I am a widow. The neighbors will talk.'
I didn't know what to do, and I told her so. You see, Tim, I was used to 'mother.'
"So took the kindest care of Adelaide, and
I always remember that. You know how

A CHRISTIAN HERO.

The Legend of St. George and the Massacres of the English Character.

The Christian soul by prison grown,
In the dark Pagan dungeon thrown
And brighter still and brighter grew
With Heaven's kindling fire.

There is among most Protestants, and we fear among not a few Catholics, a feeling more or less vagely organized it may be, but still strong, that a real saint cannot possibly have character enough for a hero. This feeling or sentiment may be judged of deduced from many obvious signs. For instance: The character of those who are chosen as popular heroes of all kinds; the favor shown and applause given to those who are eighty, fifty, twenty, and fifteen, are considered "plucky" and "fearless," shows all by the recognized standard of excellence in the English public schools and universities. Why are the real heroes of an English schoolboy, of an Englishman? Those who show the most pluck, nerve to be brave and plucky, dominance of self-mastable, to master how cruel the times, immoral, selfish, or proud they may be. The blackness of crime itself is dominated by the nerve, energy, and unbendin pluck of the felon. We trust we shall be considered neither superfluous nor unbelievable in affirming that independence, self-mastery, and self-control are those "virtues" which Britons prize most, love above all beyond Wealth, and regard as the most fundamental portion of the present-day Christianity. Whatever, could not England become if, discarding the Sermon that Sermon, and by this alone, reached the finest people in the world, and cousing the consistent Christian, and, in a word, the other man," they bore down the popular idol of their own creation, the typical Christ-like, self-sacrificing, self-mastery, Christian virtues, and Christian saints, as to those days, alas, long passed, when the Christian "as the Isle of Saints," and "the Dowry of Mary!" The ideals of Christian perfection are shown in all their beauty in the Catholic Church and there is a wonderful variety, and nowhere else, for nature subservient to grace; not causing those subjects to be cast in one mold, but developing the unimpassioned sandy sandy sandy, lion, leopards, warm hearted sons, according to the circumstances of whose lives are in many respects similar to ourselves, and with our their triumphs, and attained to a more or less complete and perfect blossoming, in the ideal, by means which an Catholics have daily at our command. Let us, then, be Christian, or, at least, be Christian in common, that a reputation for "fairness" in media of fitness, and "fair play" and "manly" thinking is independent or "manly."

It is a fatal fault when such a fault, it is a sentiment as false as any of those scores of misbeliefs that are floating round us, and of which we have daily.

Next to our Blessed Lord, who is the Ideal, and the Original of Christian character or divine, and His Holy Mother, the Ideal Christian, the glorious Apostles and imitation of Englishmen, the glorious saints and martyrs of Christ, for ages have been more universally honored than this great Christian hero. Protestant first, and Catholic, and Greek, and Armenian have vied with each other in doing honor to this saint.

During the comparative calm that prevailed the great lands and half-conquered tribes at the end of the third century, George the son of a noble Christian parentage in the of Cappadocia, was appointed tribune in the army of the Emperor Diocletian. He was a man of great bodily strength, and a vigorous day for the beginning of the time of the Christian persecution. Fifty years the Imperial edict ordering the persecution of Christians was published in the following April it was published in the Nicomedia, and was the signal for a storm which George was tribune was quartered. Fled with rage, he tore down the edict from the blasphemous document, and was immediately seized and thrown into the dungeon. Of the sufferings of the martyr, we have no record, but we could make them but their own live so. Tortured for and with, the Christ, he was a constant tradition affirms that during the days, alas, long passed, when Christ was only in the Irish, but in the Latin tongue, and the oldest in the libraries on the Continent are the production of Irishmen, were the teachers of the early age of Christian Europe as well in learning as religion." Montalembert says—"In the early ages Ireland sent forth an entire people, nation of philosophers, writers, missionaries, and scholars dominated by the spirit of the Gospel and of Christian education." Ireland, then, was the Christian Ireland—proof, old, fresh—of the Catholicity of the Saints—the emerald gem of the sea—all tasteful Ireland, where men spread up like grass, to the dismay of England—the native home of the hard thinkers, of Joannes Erigena, of Berkeley, of Tuam—the country of Moyes, the country of O'Connell—a people of brilliant speech and poetic fancy, which still preserves in this, the old age of the world, the power and the glory of poetry."

SEND US LOCAL CATHOLIC NEWS.

We would again respectively ask the Clergy or any of our readers of the vicinity Parishes to send us local items of general interest, in order to make the Monitor a chronicle of all Church happenings relating to the progress of religion. We cannot do so unless we are aided by those who have the knowledge of the facts in their keeping. Here facts are all we want. Will our friends please furnish us with them?

BENEDICTINES IN AMERICA.

Wonderful Growth of this Great Order.

The first appearance of the Benedictines in this country, says the Boston Pilot, was in the year 1846, when at the time when the Bishop of Know Nothingism was stalking through the land and threatening to exterminate Catholicity.

When the storm raged on "deep Gallia" and the spoliation of the Church and destruction was about to overtake them, they found out a place of refuge in the land which followed the burning of churches and convents and exploits, in the years at the rabid spirit of anti-Catholic Jacobinism prevailed in France, and the Benedictines, seeing the storm gathering, and the Church in agony raised their prayers to Him who alone could give a protection against the rage of the enemy. It needs no attach of the imagination to conceive that the hard pressed and fled, and inspired the men venerable Benedict Wimmer, then a young priest, and but a few years before clothed with the habit of St. Benedict, to transfer himself and a few volunteer companions to what would be by them supposed the "wilds of America," and to plant here another seminary wherein would be raised a corps of soldiers of the Cross who would defend the Church would scatter her enemies. We cannot doubt that the work of Boniface Wimmer has been the work of God. The prayers of the Benedictines doubtless have is as but the "old story of the mustard seed," in the sacred history of the whole Church in miniature.

Abbot Wimmer stands to day like some sentinel on the Rocky Mountains a forest, looking down on a growth that time must strengthen, and which, by its marvellous activity, patience, confidence, all promising success, and which, if it lasts, has shown a grafted. How few in the Church have been equal to the task of grafting!

The mother house of the Benedictine Order in America is the Abbey of Saint St. Vincent, situated three-quarters of a mile from Beatty's Station and forty-one miles from Pittsburgh, on the Pennsylvania Central Railroad. It is one of the largest abbeys in the world, and is the seat of Abbot Wimmer in the year 1855. The original grant was made by the State, recognizing the part pertaining to the parish church, and, with the exception of the main building it would make about twelve only carry city blocks, all of brick. The entire structure is the work of the lay brothers of the order. There are included on this enclosure, besides the College and Seminary, the novitiate, the administrative and the abbey. Besides the monastery the abbey are all sorts of workshops where every trade is carried on, and, in fact, a complete home use, and, where practicable, for and rounding neighbors. There is a large grist mill, a saw mill, a tannery, a shoe factory, pottery, printing establishment, cooper, tailor, carpenter, and, in fact, a complete little world, where every want may be supplied, and, in fact, almost all have been acquired and are kept by the brothers of the religious order of the Benedictines. In a word, the success that has followed the foundation of Abbot Wimmer, appears but little less than miraculous, and, in fact, is miraculous what may not be built! Let us, in a general view, take a view of the whole monastic structure at St. Vincent's.

Father Boniface was ordained in New York on the 16th of September, 1846. He had with him a few other Christian young men, students of Carpadocus, was appointed tribune in the army of the Emperor Diocletian. He was a man of great bodily strength, and a vigorous day for the beginning of the time of the Christian persecution. Fifty years the Imperial edict ordering the persecution of Christians was published in the following April it was published in the Nicomedia, and was the signal for a storm which George was tribune was quartered. AT THE YARD-ARM.

Recollections of an Eye-Witness of an Execution on a United States War Vessel.

The Hanging of Mutchipman Spencer for Mutiny.

"I was a boy in the United States Navy on the long Somers, in '42, when the three men were hung that were referred to in the 'Lookout' column of the Tribune some time ago," said John W. Harris, on Chestnut street, the other day. "The night of those men hanging at the yard arm, and their burial in the sea at dark, has haunted me all my life. If often comes on me when I'm walking along the street. I can repeat forget it. I knew Spencer, the young man who was the first hanged, and died well of a fellow, about nineteen years old, but good-natured, and a good sailor, indeed. I think the execution of all the three was a mistake, and is looking back at it now I believe that it was a foul murder.

"We sailed from New York on the 25th of September, '42, for the coast of Africa, but first began cruising in the West Indies. In the latter part of November, before we reached St. Thomas, Midshipman Spencer, who was the son of the Secretary of War, came to me, very serious one day, got in double irons and kept a prisoner in close confinement. Day after day, he kept in close confinement, who was acting as boatswain, and who was an Crummell, and a negro, who was captain of the main-top, named Small, were arrested a day or two after, and, followed by the arrest of Wm. Wright, all were put in double irons. We had no regular guard on board. The officers appeared to be frightened to death about something and were very quiet. The officers were afraid to be seen talking to each other for fear of being arrested. There was a great deal that he had formed a plot to seize the vessel, and, after killing all the officers, and turn into a piratical crack. Among others, he communicated his plan to the men's mates and to the boys, and the conspirators and told the whole story to Lieut. Gansevoort, the officer of the deck.

"Two or three days after the arrests a court-martial was assembled on board and called in a number of the ship's crew to testify against the prisoners. I was one of them. The opinions of each witness were taken down, but the accused men were not allowed to see the witnesses or hear what the charges were to detain and were confined in the ship's cabin. Spencer was the only one who had a counsel, Mr. Crowell and Small, were told to get ready to die; that they were going to swing at the yard-arm at sunrise. Spencer and the other men in irons, acknowledged their guilt and were willing to die, but Spencer and Small protested his innocence of the last, and said he was willing to die for what he had nothing to do with the plot. Call all hands to witness the execution of the Lieutenant. The ship's company unwillingly assembled, and the three men were hung at other points, while the officers of the ship stood around with drawn sword and pistols ready to cut down any who should attempt to inflict the awful penalty. When everything was ready, the signal for the companions were allowed to bid their friends good by, then Capt. Mackenzie gave the signal, a gun was fired, the colors were hauled down, the men were cut down in irons, with capstan their faces, were swung on to the main-yard arm, it was a fine night to look at. Mid the men, dead gauze, Commander Mackenzie then made a speech to the crew, and ordered at one time and the awful cruse of mutiny. Then the men were sewed up in the light of the battle lantern and the bodies were put in a long boat and rowed astern and towed half into the sea. It was a solemn scene, and I tell you it made a deep impression on my youthful mind that can never be erasing. I could see the flash of the gun, the pale faces in the ship's rigging. All of the men were buried from the ship's custody. Commander Mackenzie was overtaken about a month afterwards and was tried by a court-martial for the execution. He was acquitted, but he died before he reached home. He was a brutal sentiment, anything but a Christian gentleman. The officers of the fleet called him "Old Bloody Mackenzie." Spencer was a young man of great promise, and, if he had lived, would have been a great man. Alex. Mackenzie was a brutal man, and, if he had lived, would have been hung for murder. Small was a negro, and, if he had lived, would have been hung for murder. Wright was a boy, and, if he had lived, would have been hung for murder. Spencer was the only one who had a friend to plead for him

MISSION OF THE CATHOLIC PRESS.

"Journalism is the greatest social power, because it is the chief agent in reproducing time; and upon united time depends the existence of society, and the world. In our view, religious journalism is only a useful and serious occupation, not only a work indispensable to the Church, but a work of the highest utility. What is and what might be the influence of Catholic Journalism, for the social order and defend the truth, whenever it may be—above all, in Christian times."—SCHUTZ, THEOLOGICAL MORALIST, CATTANEO.

Important Considerations for Catholic Young Men.

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR:

Dear Sir.—Will you be so kind as to inform a Catholic young man of the Church in opposed in this new order known as "Knights in your next paper; if so and why, as I would like to join it, and oblige

A CONSTANT READER.

The foregoing letter from a Catholic young man, who is evidently prompted by prudence to inquire whether it is safe to enter into a new Catholic organization before he knows whether the Catholic Church is opposed to it or not, requires a more extended answer than ordinary queries. Ignorance is neither "opposed" nor condemned by the Church—except upon the general principle that where familiarity with persons of different faith, or of no faith, endangers the Christian belief of Catholics, they must not enter such organizations. Every Catholic in all such matters, should be guided by the advice of his pastor, and to him we refer the Constant Reader." But, in the meantime, there are some suggestions which we desire to lay before this prudent young man—and other Catholic young men—which may open their eyes to some few of the many snares which exist in fraternal, beneficial or social societies wherein Catholics are few and infidels and non-Catholics very numerous.

The Catholic young man who says his prayers in the morning, invariably repeats that beautiful prayer which comes to us from God Himself. In the "Our Father" he asks of God that he be not led into temptation, and that he be delivered from evil. These powerful petitions, in their practical bearing, where instituted by our Heavenly Father so that we might not be led into temptation or be delivered from evil, in our virtue, and in our fidelity to His Heavenly ordinances. Let of what use are our prayers if we voluntarily run into temptation by joining quasi-secret societies where we become a component part of a promiscuous gathering of Protestants, paganized politicians, and painted young women—whose only knowledge is to name the most fashionable opera, to whirl on wheels in a skating rink or to grate like so many geese on an ice pond in the round-dance revelry of a ball room!

The two classes who prevail in non-Catholic associations may be divided into half-lapsed young men and hair-brained young women, and the virtuous, pious and respectable young men who goes into their midst has—in the eyes of that God whom he mockingly asks that he may not be led into temptation—everything to lose and nothing to gain. Man is a social animal, but Catholic young men should remember that "no company is better than bad company," and when you call half a hundred infidels, atheists, apostates and sectarians your betters, you insult the saints in heaven; you offer violence to the Mother of God; and you unwittingly outrage the very God who gave you the graces of Catholic Faith! What do you gain for this great loss! You may have the friendship of a few Freemasons; you may connect with Odd-fellows, have a kind nod from Knights of Pythias, be patronized by a few corrupt and corrupting politicians, and have—perhaps—your name and thus both forfeit the friendship of God and be driven from that Paradise wherein you at present dwell—the pure, peaceful and perfect paradise of your holy Mother Church.

Of course there are grades in these Catholic young men who "don't care" what the Pope, the Cardinals, or the Bishops of the Catholic Church say about the dangers surrounding such Catholic and non-Catholic societies. They would enter them even if Satan stood at the portal of the "Lodge" or the "Parlor" as "outside sentinel." With this class of Inconsistent and renegade Catholic young men, no words of the MONITOR have any weight, for the reason that they are too strong in their foolishness to permit any power to persuade them of their folly. But we address ourselves to Catholic young men whose Fathers have risked their souls by joining suspicious societies in which the friends and the foes of God were placed upon an equal footing of friendship and called each other "Brothers." We appeal to those Catholic young men whose belief teaches them that there is never be any bond of "brotherhood" between the blessed souls in heaven who represent the Church triumphant, and Hell—Satan's establishment, which represents the arch enemies of that God whom all Catholics adore.

Every true Catholic dearly loves the Blessed and Immaculate Mother of God, yet in non-Catholic societies he associates with men and women whose vilest thoughts and most wicked words are hurled forth when in mixed sectarian company—against the most sugared character of the Queen of Heaven. Can anything good come to a Catholic young man who associates with such modern imitators of the crowd who crucified the Son of God!

Again, "mixed marriage" is one of the deadly sins that effect the heart of God's Church in our day, and the foolish young Catholic man who may be invegled into a non-Catholic society with a captivating companion, may find himself an spouse before many years membership. The Miss Daisy Doodlithe who form the female portion of the "Order," can coil like serpents whilst they can bite down. The results is that our Catholic young man is captivated and captured. He proposes marriage, is accepted, and the bride leads her unfortunate victim by the halter before some Justice of the Peace, and there is performed the parody of that union which our Blessed Lord elevated into a sacrament! Of course when the beautiful bride goes to her church, her docile "husband" has to accompany her, and as the bride becomes a mother her female children are called "Violets," or "Daisies," or "Pensies" or by some other botanical cognomen unknown to Christianity, and the boys are called "Ajax," "Cadmus," "Midas," and by some other mythological nomenclature in a Christian land! Was it for this sadness that the first act performed in life by a priest, upon this young man, was to give him the grace of Catholic faith! Was faith given to him as the heritage of a holy father and mother that he might barter it for the hand of the handsome Delilah who has shorn him of his locks, destroyed the peace of his soul, and rendered him a social apostate in the sight of God and all the heavenly hosts!

Reflect, ye Catholic young men, if Catholic young men who have the loss of your faith can never be counterbalanced by the gain of the whole world. Pray to God to keep you from temptation, and fortify your souls against the honey trapping poison-blood from the doubly dangerous net-work which Satan uses through non-Catholic or half-Catholic societies to ensnare the souls of your sons and half sons, and the souls of all the generations bearing your name that may follow you.

Wise is that Catholic young man who follows the counsel given him by the Vicar of Christ, and on the very point of "dangerous association," the Sovereign Pontiff proclaimed this important caution no later than last year in his most memorable Encyclical, and we sincerely hope to heaven that his words will sink deep into the hearts of the hundreds of Catholic young men who—like "A Constant Reader"—are being daily importuned to enter societies where the cursing contact with non-Catholics will first lead to indifference towards their faith, and subsequently end in Infidelity.

Our Holy Father in speaking of the fraudulent efforts used to ensnare Catholic young men into dangerous societies, thus spoke to the Prelates of the Catholic Church:

"In the fourth place, in order more easily to attain what We wish, to your fidelity and watchfulness We commit, as a special reason the young, as being the hope of human society. Devote the greatest part of your care to their instruction and to their training in the fear of God, and in the love of the Holy Redeemer, whom God has promised to those who do not deny Him before men in this life.

—To give some idea of the activity of the celebrated Society of the Foreign Missions of Paris, we may quote from the last Report the following facts: "During 1880 there working in the twenty five missionary districts committed to the care of the Society, 75 bishops and 600 missionary priests. The letter were supplemented by 471 native priests and 2,016 catechists. In a total of 2,016 schools and orphanages, there were 46,151 children being educated and in no less than thirty-five seminaries, 1,294 youths and young men were being trained for the priesthood. The number of baptisms was as follows. Adult heathens, 17,878; children of Christian parents, 31,096; children of heathen parents, 190,104; that is 312,740 souls added to the Church. These figures deserve to be widely known."

Editorial Notes.

—A subscriber sends us a marked copy of a Kansas paper in which is described a scene in a church where "a priest preached with a bonnet of revelrous disguised to his waist." The story is told of St. Mary's Church, Kansas City. The report is half-solemn long and the same with which the writers or re-publishers have made it appear that the Church and the "priest" were Catholic is quite remarkable. The "altar" is referred to not the "retinent." The so-called "priest" is an Episcopalian preacher named Jardine, who has been blackening up some ritualistic romps in a so-called St. Mary's Church, Kansas City, and has no more to do with the Catholic Church than the horse on a canal has to do with a steamship.

—In a few articles which appeared in the MONITOR last winter concerning a certain society in which a correspondent informed us that three-fourths of the members were Catholics, we designated such associations as one of the evils of the Masonic nest. How correct our idea of the "three-fourth Catholic" association was at that time, may be judged from the fact that among the numerous resolutions of regret for the death of General Grant, one of the lodges of this quasi Masonic concupiscent commenced expressing its regrets after this well-known Masonic fashion: "Whereas, The Great Captain in Flight," etc. And this blasphemous burlesque of Almighty God's name was endorsed by hundreds of young men calling themselves Catholics, and is signed by a Catholic committeeman! By their fruits societies of all kinds are best known, and when an association claiming side has—in the eyes of that God whom he mockingly asks that he may not be led into temptation—everything to lose and nothing to gain. Man is a social animal, but Catholic young men should remember that "no company is better than bad company," and when you call half a hundred infidels, atheists, apostates and sectarian your betters, you insult the saints in heaven; you offer violence to the Mother of God; and you unwittingly outrage the very God who gave you the graces of Catholic Faith! What do you gain for this great loss! You may have the friendship of a few Freemasons; you may connect with Odd-fellows, have a kind nod from Knights of Pythias, be patronized by a few corrupt and corrupting politicians, and have—perhaps—your name and thus both forfeit the friendship of God and be driven from that Paradise wherein you at present dwell—the pure, peaceful and perfect paradise of your holy Mother Church.

—Brave! Brave Belgians!

We feel proud of the record which the Catholics of Belgium have made in their splendid struggle for the supremacy of Catholic principles against the Masonic orbal that sought to crush the Cross beneath the iron heel of despotism. As the readers of the MONITOR may remember, the infidel element of the Belgian government established free State schools where secular education alone was imparted to the pupils; by teachers were paid fat salaries to separate from the godless colleges of carnalism, and every possible inducement was offered to Catholic parents to send their children to schools where their faith would be smothered beneath secularism. But—to their immortal honor be it proclaimed—the Catholic people of Belgium refused the bribe that offered them to sell their faith for a mess of Masonic pottage, hence they bravely banded together, established schools of their own, procured teachers at their own expense—and sent their children to schools where they could find Almighty God's name in their text-books, and lessons morals through the accumulated knowledge of their faith.

The Masonic government at once set to work to break down the Catholic schools, and this work of Satan they have persistently pursued for nearly two years, but—Lo, Behold!—victory has at length crowned the Catholic cause in Belgium, and the adherents of Belshazzar have been vanquished!

Government educational statistics just recently been published which exhibit the unity, firmness, and determination which must have pervaded the Belgian Catholic body in its determination not to let the diabolical institutes of an infidel government get the best of them in the battle for the religious training of their children. Up to July 1st, the number of Communes in Belgium which have obtained the Royal permission to suppress existing official schools—in consequence of their failure to secure scholars—was one hundred and thirty eight! Of the godless government schools thus suppressed:

54 (or more than one third) had not a single pupil!

3 had only a single pupil each!

7 had two pupils each!

9 had three pupils each.

Altogether, says the Belgian statistician, these one hundred and thirty eight godless government schools had only 579 pupils—or a little over an average of four pupils per school! The Catholic schools, in these Communes were attended by nearly eighteen thousand pupils!

Every Catholic who reads these gratifying statistics should say from his inmost heart and with his warmest ardor: "God bless the Catholics of Belgium!" They have demonstrated to the Catholics of three United States what can be accomplished for the preservation and propagation of Catholic faith even in the face of a Freemason government, and their magnificent victory should teach the Catholics of this land the grand lesson: "To live and die faithful,"

Marvanne's Maiden Dream.

A CALIFORNIA EPIC POEM BY OR TABOT'S PRIVATE PIGEON

Epic poetry is universally admitted to be the most sublime and majestic style of versification which can emanate from the human mind. Homer, Virgil, Milton and Tasso gained world-wide fame for composition of this character, and inasmuch as California equals any other country in the world in climate, magnanimity of sentiment, fruitfulness of soil, and facilities for seeing men's souls, we do not see why the golden State cannot boast of an Epic poem written just as well as Italy, Greece, Italy, Spain or any other country where dramatic incidents have been developed in time. Hence we have the unusual and distinguished honor to introduce to our readers this week a sanctimonious young lady from somewhere or so pretty [illegible] "gone to seed" [illegible] "takes the rake" over any one the size of that character who has ever appeared in our columns during the 26 years 10 months and 15 days of the MONITOR's existence!

As a rule we publish the original poems which our gifted contributors generously furnish us, without any editorial comment, but this California Epic is of such peculiar construction that we feel it our duty to our portion of our readers would be completely non-pleased to discover the beauties of its descriptive, calculated to represent mountains, or to fathom the trochaic and iambic graces with which the hugely gilted female genius has so generously gifted to lavishly adorned this latest style of the modern school of Epic poetry.

In "old day" times the people were taught that poets were born with souls, but to show how mistaken the world was in this idea, it is only necessary to state that from manhood's early dawn Homer became a blind wooer of the Muses who can make verses with the same velocity that sausages are wired in some of the world, and Virgil taken notion which these "ancients" possessed, was that Spring was the best season for poetical effusions to find a market. Such may have been the case in Macedonia, Mesopotamia, Thessalia and other antiquated lands, but here in California—and we speak from long and bitter experience—the most fruitful season for poetry is Summer, just after the green, but genial cucumber, and the stomach-aching watermelon have become the usual courters of cholera morbus!

We have christened this cherished Epic of "Maryanne's Maiden Dream," not that the Christian cognomen of the fair and flighty poet bears any resemblance thereto, but because it was hoped that Maryanne's fair dream, and besides there are so few young ladies in modern days who are called by that name, that we thought it only right that the MONITOR at least should have the "Maryanne" among its corps of those who "take the pledge."

Who tides the poetic Tomes
Up the mount Parnassus.

With this too brief introduction for such a sublime poetic composition we have in store for our readers, we ask their unbridled attention while we roll back the literary curtain and reveal to their astonished gaze the first stanza of "Maryanne's Maiden Dream."

Epics generally begin with a startling apostrophe, hence the reader can see why Maryanne should scream: "I had a terrible awful dreadful dream!" People of prosy temperaments may think those three adjectives too profuse on Maryanne's part, but those critics should remember that "poetic license"—like charity—covers a multitude of sins either in stymology, syntax or prosody. With this explanation we introduce the next stanza

Of a man hoved, loving, and true,
And nothing wrong could he do.

People who live in the village where this terribly talented writer of Epic poetry resides, must feel proud of the character which our Maryanne has given to at least one citizen of that prosaic portion of the Pacific Coast, and if they can discover "this man" who "nothing wrong could do," they should certainly bestow all the honor upon him their corporate capacity will admit—for such men are mighty scarce in the world at this writing. This last is generously admitted, even by a great optimist as Mary Ann herself, when her muse thus mounts the second stanza:

But still I suppose in our world here,
We dream wrong of those we love dear.

From this it would appear that Maryanne was mistaken, but not so, as she has what navigators call "a second hitch to her halyards," which saves her thus in the next stanza:

And even if this we love the best,
But some think it who come next.

There! Anybody can see through the glittering of Maryanne's genius the mystic form of that phenomenon "who comes next," and recognize the realistic presence of the other fellow "in very deed" in the dim distance! Now comes the prologue to the catastrophe upon which the Epic is founded, and hence we want the strict attention of our readers as Maryanne reveals it in all its descriptive detail:

This man was by one day,
Looking suspiciously round every way.

There is a melo-dramatic form and flavor to this stanza that stamps it indelibly upon the mind and at once places the fearless wrath of Milton upon the munificent backbone of Maryanne's Epic. It requires but a short stretch of the imagination to bring the whole scene before the reader with a realistic perspective that surpasses even the highest flights of modern poetic imagination. There is the street, the corner grocery, the man who was "by," and his suspicious glances "every way," in order to assure himself that the inhabitants were looking away from him, so he might get on the blind side of its corner. This was passed the one day portion of this man's life, but what he did that night let Mary-anne reveal to us

And when night came he was missed from home,
Where his wife and family were left alone.

This assertion of Maryanne's muse would indicate that her hero was like the nobility of martial ranks in this age, who prefer the saloon to the comfort of home. But not so, this man—who as Maryanne has already asserted as—"nothing wrong could do"—had an object in being from home, which fact our readers will realize as we proceed unbolting the Epic scroll. Thus

At midnight when everything should be still,
The epileptic poisoned with absinthe were filled.

Here we have a continuity of circumstances which lead up to a climax, preparing the mind for the final catastrophe. Some of Mary Maryanne in modern times manuscript so sanctified of asterisks in order to denote an ellipsis, or the omission of a portion of the Epic. Here they are as Maryanne sads them

It may be, however, that Maryanne introduced these typical stars in order to afford our readers a chance to draw a long breath before they undertook to grasp the meaning of the next measure in the Epic which is everything to say the least of it:

At last when all was united down,
The policemen all ran from the town.

When people get politics into the war path, readers may look out for a rapidly-coming denouement. Hence when all the policemen "ran from the town," which—as Maryanne writes it—"was quite a down"—we may easily anticipate what followed which was

To find the meaning of the stillness broke,
And see for themselves the flames and smoke.

Poor astonished "cops!" How they must have gazed in amazement at the scene! But the tame police were exhibit by equal to any emergency, because we have Maryanne's word for it that at sight of the flames they rushed to the fence

And rushing forward with eager tare,
Thy extinguished the flames with earnest care.

Here we must confess that Maryanne's "tare," which the town policemen took, rather puzzled us, but we decided it Wheat, Worcester, Walker, Johnson, and all the works of all other word-makers we have in our vocabulary, and discovering the proper definition for Maryanne's "tare," we had heard the expression "tare and bonds" in our youth in Ireland, the "tare" of commerce we are familiar with; but Maryanne's "tare" mystified us until we met a Welshman who told us it meant fence or cover in his language, and then we concluded that our Maryanne was familiar with Taffy's tongue and thus came to use a word which would confuse an ordinary scribe who never saw the Menai straits.

Of course the commotion among the gallant "cops" in a military movement which a Yankee might call "a tare of tarts," attracted the attention of the numerous citizens of the nearest hurg, and so our Maryanne continued the Epic

Finding the cause of the great uproar, crowds sprang out from neighbors door.

These lines are—at first glance—a little misleading, as people are not familiar with the topography of the village where the writer resides, might imagine from Maryanne's muse that there was only one door in the whole city. The editor, however, can depict such an illusion, as we sinned that now famous town a couple of years ago, and saw more than twenty-one doors from corning out may there! The fact of only one door now is convenient to that poetic license so plenified for her previously.

The secret Maryanne has for capitalizing the first word in the second line of this stanza may also be attributed to one of those peculiarities which all poets evince when the spirit of sweet song moves their muse in mystic murmurings. But here we pause—for we confess we know nothing could do"—apparently on the scene again in this attitude—according to Maryanne's manuscript

And into the midst of the crowd there rear
The one whom I'm speaking of the honest man.

With what fine irony these lines are wrought! The reader can almost hear the "cops" crowd from their stations horse-back hurries across lots to where smoke and blaze and blinding fire was blasting all before them! It seems that the chivalrous crash had been during, because Maryanne adds

Who had awoke in a terrible dream.
And into a home where he did not dream;

Now! He did not "dream," because he was in a "dream," and it was "a home" that—as Maryanne's muse insists the emergency

His senses would soon be changed to pain,
Into
A group of ballas laid in a mass.

What a sublime conception of a holocaust of human beings burned in a blazing building. The eccentricities of genius will agitate the critical world the more amazed the last line is made up, but then no prosaical reader has any right to curb the Pegasian steed of California's Epic Conceiver! But let us hasten to reach the climax!

He himself was the cause of dand
Which happened yesterday over a stand.

These lines "let the cat out of the bag," or, rather—to be more correct—they let the horse out of the stable, as it appears from Maryanne's muse that "a home track" was the cause of all the calamity which caused the commotion in question. We presume that the man who was such a rare cow as to be enshrined in this epic as one who "no wrong could do" thought he was badly cheated by swapping horse with some certainty sharp, hence he determined to "get even," which he did after this fashion as set forth by our Maryanne.

His horse was to be very bright,
And he set he to their house that night.

Whose house is meant by "their" is another of those mysterious allusions which Maryanne's muse delights in, and the fate of "their" is the dirge-like toll of Maryanne's tale, because she climaxes her epic with this astonishing stanza

It burned his victims all alive
While he started off to the still.

Ordinary readers may think that these lines do not "jingle" to suit their musical ears, but Maryanne's muse is one of the Mustang order, and so she prances through the English language with a heedlessness that horts both the muse and Maryanne. But—we are proud to record the fact—Maryanne does not care a fig for a genius, and genius carries with it the right to go wrong in any avenue where it may volunteer to disport itself for the enlightenment or improvement of mankind.

But our regret about this magnificent epic is that the hero who "started off in the stills" did not make Maryanne his wife, for then Cali-muses might be favored with a poetical progeny which would have immortalized our growing State and make it the home of the heavenly Muses!

Pete Maryanne may Calliope and her train
Never make thy Epidemics home again!

Was this American Idolatry?

We want those non-Catholic "cranks" who still continue to use the obsolete phrase "idolatry" against us Catholics to read the following two items—which we clip from a New York newspaper—slowly and carefully:

People crowded into Underiaker Merritt's store in Eighth avenue in such numbers yesterday that the sidewalk in front of the place was blocked and increased to twenty-eight men. The doors were closed at half-past 8 o'clock, eight-hour people kept going all night, coffin. Yesterday the crowd passed in at the late door, walked around the coffin, gazed for a moment into the coffin, and went by the right doorway in an incessant but orderly procession. Many men lifted their hats reverently as they passed the coffin.

At Hallet, who said he was one of the workingmen who helped to dig the grave, said for him, Grant's remains at Riverside Park, Grant's remains were placed in a vault in the side hill, the neighborhood of Grand street and South Fifth avenue, and the place is so well guarded that it would be quite impossible, and will be for five years to come, for any one to disturb the remains. Grant's grave is now safe.

The veneration paid to the relics and wood which comprised Gen. Grant's coffin, and the purchase of the dirt and stones from Gen. Grant's grave, must certainly partake far more of "idolatry" than does the reverence paid to the Cross of Christ, or the relics of Saints. We put these two facts on record so as to preserve them in print ready to fling at the head of any bigoted Orangeman who may hereafter be so ignorant and bigoted as to charge us with "idolatry" when treating of the custom of Catholics in our reverence for the Cross or the veneration for the relics of the Saints and Martyrs.

Topics of the Times.

There is one instance out of a hundred like it that is happening in this country at most every week in the year "At the end of a mission given a few weeks ago by Father Luger, at Marcus, Iowa, thirteen Protestants, including a Dr. Kenny, became Catholics, thirty-six grown persons were prepared for their First Communion, one hundred and twelve men, and women and sixty four children were confirmed by Archbishop Grace, and one hundred received Holy Communion. Thus it is that the grace of God manifests its influence on the souls of men in a mysterious way.

The Month, for July contains a most suggestive—and interesting—article by Mr. Edward Lucas, entitled "The Conversion of England." The writer does not recommend a Propaganda amongst professing Protestants, but he does—as the Month asserts. But he demonstrates very conclusively that the English Catholic body has lost a truly appalling number of its members who have drifted away from the Church and sunk into the indifferentism of the world, and he shows that if the Catholic Church is to make any headway in England alone, but throughout the world at well he recommends lay activity, organization, and work amongst the poor in the spirit of Christian charity

The uncertainties of life come to us in many unexpected ways, and the following is an example that proves the truth of the saying "This life is lined with disappointments." A young Catholic young lady 22-year-old girl named Katy Kennitz came from Sissitim in Germany to this country to become a nun in Cincinnati. She was married lound work at Trinidad, Colorado, and had sent for her. She made the voyage alone. In one sense she arrived at Uncle Gordon in New York, she burned. When she reached Trinidad, she found her husband had been killed on a railroad the previous day. The poor little heart was turned to bitterness, and the day that was to have seen her married, lighted her lifeway to the cottage of her intended husband to the grave.

The Catholic Temperanly at Lorrain has been holding high feast in honor of its national patron saint, Alphonsus Liguori. Many, also celebrated the anniversary of the first presidency of the College Maria Theresa—the academic and scientific hall of residence at the Lorrain College. The chief of the proceedings was the presentation to Mgr. Lamy of his portrait in oils, the gift of friends, and a most eloquent address was delivered on the occasion by a brilliant manifestation in the round theatre attached to his palace, and a full report of the proceedings would give it permed, they would open their eyes to the fact that we are religiously speaking "in the wine-pay," and the nearer they accede from King Henry the Eighth's creation of a new religion in Europe, the better their chances of heaven hereafter. This pamphlet can be purchased at Wattlesfield's, 127 Market street.

THE FEAST OF THE ASSUMPTION.

Its Origin, Meaning and Importance.

Next Saturday, the 15th inst., will be a holy day of obligation—the feast of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary. Tradition informs us that the Apostles, dispersed throughout the Jewish and Pagan lands, preached and taught the Christian doctrine, and that when death was at hand, the Blessed Virgin was in the city of Ephesus, that she was the people and conduct of the Apostles, that she lived (according to generally accepted tradition) to the age of 72 years, and that she died at Ephesus.

The Church, inspired by the Apostles, has always believed that the august Mother of God was "assumed" or taken up, body and soul, into heaven immediately after her death, and that she was raised to a throne thither only to that of God Himself. Without false or exaggerated sentiment, the Catholic Church has always cherished this tradition, and has developed as Christianity extended until at length it has become the universal opinion of the whole Catholic world.

There is a tradition existing in the East which states that some days before our Blessed Lord called His Divine Mother to Him the Angel Gabriel was sent to visit the Blessed Virgin, which he announced to her in the words when we quote, "in the place where she lay a sweet harmony, which was a sign to the holy Apostles that Mary was about to leave them. At this sweet harmony, Peter, waking out of his sweet sleep, rubbed his holy hands, and said to the holy Apostles, 'Let us rise, for the Angel of God has come to us, and has sent us this sweet harmony, and we shall be ready to receive the holy Mother of our Lord.' The Apostles rose and dying eyes on them, said—as if he did thus he would have spoken if he had a tongue—'I will never cease thinking of you!' And soon the Apostle John, who was in Ephesus, and Paul, who was in Rome, were in the cloud of His Divine Mother, and they were with Her in Jerusalem, and they were able to be present at the Blessed Virgin's death-bed, and to bury her in the tomb. It only arrived three days after her happy departure. Full of grief, the Apostles went to the tomb, and opened it to see the sweet body of our Lord's Mother, but it was not there. Then they closed the tomb, and we are sure they were not disappointed when they found the tomb empty. Then the Apostles were sorrowful, and some fellow-apostles of the Apostles, who were in the world, were present, and some fellow-apostles of the Apostles, who were in the world, were present, and they were sorrowful, and they said, 'Let us go to the place where our Lord's Mother is, and we will be with Her.' And they went to the place where our Lord's Mother was, and they found Her in the place where she was, and they were with Her, and they were happy, and they were happy, and they were happy

COLOR BLINDNESS.

Red and Green the Most Difficult Colors to Distinguish.

Professor Monoyer says: "The most frequent defect in color blindness is the inability to distinguish red. A distinguished professor in an English university once wore a scarlet gown through the streets, much to the amusement of many who saw him. On being asked by a friend what appeared to him to be the color of his robe, he answered pointing to some everyone else, "Green, of course, as green as those as closely as possible." The next color most frequently mistaken for some other is green. The importance of this defect is estimated by the frequency of its occurrence. If it occurs only once in 10,000 persons it is of course of less importance than if it happened once in 100. Men are more frequently afflicted with this defect in vision than women. The defect, when it is congenital, as it is in most of the cases under the observation of physicians, is incurable. It is sometimes induced by immoderate use of tobacco or liquor. As many as one in twenty five of the men employed in lines of travel are affected by this inability to distinguish red from green. The color blind, in case of accident by travel on land or sea, cannot be readily detected, because of the difficulty of tracing the causes of the accident. One thus affected cannot tell a red from a green light, but one of those lights appears darker or lighter to him than the other. The test of color blindness is not how well one can name colors, but how much he can distinguish them. If two letters drawn, one red and another green, on the background, a person who is red blind will distinguish only the green letter, and a person who is green blind would fail to distinguish or see the green letter. In other words, to the first the red color is suppressed, and to the second the green. The red blind will phase a purple or a green alongside of a rose color, supposing them all to be the same shade. The green blind will confound the blue and the gray with the rose color. The test for an engineer is not to name colors or shades of color, but to know red as red and green as green, and to match red with red and green with green of their various shades. Four per cent. of the 50,000 employes of the Pennsylvania have been found totally color blind, and 10 per cent. more or less affected with this defect of vision. Five per cent. of the men were found with imperfect hearing. In this city lines well known national painter who is entirely color blind. He selects his color not by learning the color itself, but by reading their names on the tubes. He employs usually only black, brown and white in his work. Dr. Jeffries, of Philadelphia, instituted a very efficient test for color blindness by suspending numbered skeins of worsted of different colors from a rod. The standard colors of rose, red and green, with all the varied shades of these colors, were numbered with the odd numbers, all the other colors were numbered with the even numbers. The persons examined for color blindness were invited to match shades of the three named before as the standard. But if any so named were among those numbered with the even numbers it was seen at once and that they were unable to distinguish colors."

The Sin of Retraction.

It is our duty never to permit any word to proceed out of our mouth which may either prejudice our neighbor's reputation, or be unmerciful of the least unkindness. Never give ear to any that speak them, but, on the contrary, employ all the prudence that God doth give us, to stop up in them all such discourses. Let your speech be always free from flattery when you speak of others, and from vanity when you speak of your, are obliged to fear not to speaking well of ourselves and ill of our neighbor. The better way to secure ourselves from all these dangers is to speak little; if we can be silent without prejudicing charity or obedience, let us willingly hold our peace. Let not our silence, nevertheless, be burdensome or of ill edification to any one. We should not engage ourselves to consider the sentiments of another, nor be obstinate against any one. When we listen willingly to a detractor, we are guilty of the same sin as he is. The detractor is a coward; he never has the courage to strike his enemy up open blow; he dare not stand before him face to face; he is like the cowardly assassin. This sin of detraction is very dangerous in itself. The detractor too often tries to strike his murderous blow; he does this because it is easy to perpetrate. He is hateful to God. He has will been called by an ancient Writer "A terror to the country." We cannot excuse ourselves by saying that that which he told of another, and which may have injured him, was true; for of such a detraction. And when we think we speak only the truth, can we be always sure that it is the truth? May not the story be false? May it not be exaggerated by others, or even by ourselves adding a little circumstance or one to make it the more interesting, if not the more hurtful? The only remedy, if we would not be guilty of this great sin of detraction, is not to assist in circulating stories calculated to harm our neighbor. Neither should we as much as listen to such stories, but should show by our manner, if not by our words, that we do not wish to hear them.

Miss Cleveland's Good Example.

No one who witnessed the scene which took place in the grounds of the White House a week or two since can quiney the statement that Miss Cleveland is a courageous woman, says the Washington correspondent of the Boston Evening Transcript. With the humility of the practical housewife, although strictly speaking she is the President's maiden sister, Miss Cleveland made up her mind that the White House ought to undergo a thorough spring cleaning. When Mr. Arthur was President he merely gave the order and a corps of men and women were put at work, and for a day or two the mansion was completely turned upside down. Not so with Miss Cleveland. The orders were given as usual, but it wasn't a great while before the servants discovered the usual spring cleaning meant something more than to customary. Beginning with the carpets, Miss Cleveland saw that they were taken up properly and spread upon the lawn. Then she went out in a pole hoe, and "the first lady of the land" stood upright and had them thoroughly beaten, while she "homed the job." Visitors at the White House were thunderstruck, the lady clerks in the treasury department looked with all their eyes, as if they never expected to see the light again, but Miss Cleveland calmly stood her ground, until the last carpet had been returned, and then she marched back to the White House to see that the servants were cleaning the paint properly. Several numerical gentlemen have put inquiries about as to whether Miss Cleveland is "in the market," and the married men are proudly pointing to the good example set by the White House. It is feared, however, that the patience of the President's sister will never become fashionable.

FAIR PLAY.

Silo Curtis Was Bound to Have it if It Took a Leg.

"Git up!"

It was in 1864, down in front of Grant's army, and I was a mile or so outside of the Union picket, having been on a scout. I was making my way back I had been followed pretty closely by a half a dozen Confederates, and had eluded them by hiding in a thicket, after an hour's hard work in creeping along towards the nearest field fence where the thicket was thinnest. I was tired and a "rub" stepped in view from behind a large tree.

"Yank, in course!" he queried as he locked me over, holding his carbine ready for a shot.

I nodded in the affirmative.

"How are you hankin?"

I had a navy revolver in my belt, and shoved it to him.

He threw down his carbine, drew a navy from his own belt, and, coming quite close he said:

"Yank, one of us has got to die! A week ago some of you'uns set the cabin afire and turned my poor old mother out into the fields to take sick and die. I swore on her grave that I would kill the first Yank I would drive load on, and you're my meat!"

"Are you going to shoot down a prisoner in cold blood?"

"That ain't Silas Curtis—not much! It's fair game—one—two—three—fire! You shall have fair play."

"You mean we shall fight a duel?"

"Sorter one. I expect you'll shoot at me and miss, and I'll shoot at you and put a ball into your head. I'm no bushwacker to shoot a man down without a show, but I'm dead certain to kill you all the same."

We backed away from each other. The woods were fairly open, and when we had thirty feet between to there was no obstruction to deflect a bullet or annoy the eye.

"All ready, Yank!"

"Yes, Reb."

"I'll be fair. You may do the counting. Good-by to you, for I'm a dead shot."

"One—two—three—fire!"

The two pistols made one report, but as the sons filled my ears I want down. I was bewildered, half unconscious, but realized that I had been hard hit.

"Shoo, now, but I just raked his scalp!" I heard the man say as he beat over me. "Say, Yank, we must have another shot. You are powerful close to you use an cabin be I dodged a bit. Come, fair play, you know."

I tried to rise up, but fell back, and at that moment two bushwhackers rushed out of the woods and came running up. They looked talking, oaths, threats, and a bullet from a pistol tore through the cloth on my shoulder. Then I must have fainted, for the next thing I remember was of being carried on the man's shoulder back through the woods. When I fell he fell me moving he laid me down and asked:

"Say, Yank, how fur is it to your line?"

"About a mile from where we fought."

"Straight north?"

"Yes."

"Because those bushwackers was bent on mischief, and to see fair play I had to plant them both. Reckon I didn't no more business in the Confederacy other than Reckon Uncle Sam won't be up very soon on nor Jeff Davis. Yank, kin ye hang to my neck?"

"Yes."

"All right. Keep this are handkerchief, sorter waving as a signal to the picket, and I'll carry ye safe as an ambulance."

And clinging to the back of the man who had thirsted for my blood, I was soon inside the lines, and Sam was surrounded by the pickets.

Curtis refused to move because "his Curtis will see fair play if it takes a leg."

Defeated by Women.

They will never forgive him—no never. There were ten men on one side of the one, and only five women on the other, but such women conceded as good as any man, and was determined not "to hitch along" for even a pigeon. Pretty soon she set up a cry for another woman. As she entered the door she stood for a moment to see where she should sit down. One of the men rose up, pointed his finger, and called out in a lovely voice:

"Plenty of room on the other side, madam."

She sat down between two of the women, and this caused the sixth row to move. They didn't stab her with a poisoned hatpin, nor did each one sit and gaze at her but and decide that she had trimmed up an old frame with twelve shillings' worth of new material. On the contrary, the ninetyfive fastened their eyes upon the bold center.

They expressed indignation, contempt, disgust and revenge in their looks. They saw the dandruff on his coat collar. They saw the hole in his left boot. They noticed the strawberry stain on his shirt bosom. They detected the fact that had changed his ruffs and for old. All this, and she had looked him dead in the eyes and convicted him of being hungry, homeless and with nothing a blind man. He bore up for three minutes, little has it gets a set of a driver, made a bolt for the front door and was over the lawn and on the side walk.

Why He Saved the Train.

Recent heavy rains on the Charlotte, Columbia and Augusta railroad caused large washouts at several places along the line. While a train was going thirty miles an hour between Charlotte, N. C., and Columbia, the cars filled with passengers, the engineer saw a light swaying to and fro a short distance ahead of him. He had barely time to reverse his lever and apply the air-brakes, and the train was brought to a stop so suddenly that the passengers were thrown forward in their seats. The train had been signalled by a colored man who stood there with the lights in his hand, while at his back, about fifty yards distant, was a great gap in the track where the flood had swept away the embankment, rails and cross-ties. Johnson was crowded with thanks by the passengers, and Conductor Clarkson called him up, and, in a neat speech, told him his heroic act had saved many lives. The negro listened attentively and then said:

"Tell you de truth, boss. I knowed if de train hit dat gap sho it would trouble my mind mighty powerful. Dat's why I ran out on my 'ister patch by de side of de road, and rip and tar dem taters up. Taters is very sharce dis year, and I jes' ain't go to do some so I did jes' patch was nigh run over by er train or kyers."

— Five hundred tons of fish are received daily to supply London.

— It seldom happens that a tree is put out with champagne, but the Hensly baptism of a tree had given by Mrs. Lawson, wife of the proprietor of the London Telegraph. Some years ago the long test where the supper was held hung electric lights imbedded in branches of flowers. One of the tiny globes cracked, and the flames ran on all sides along the line of wire. The servants were paralyzed by the conflagration, and it was due to a very lavish use of the wine by some of the guests present that serious damage was averted.

We originally solicited correspondence from all parts of the Pacific Coast in matters pertaining to the progress of the Church or the spread of the Faith.

All communications should reach this office by Tuesday noon, so as to insure insertion.

A SCRUB RACE.

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR:—

Dear Sir—The Banner of Light, a Spiritualistic organ, recently started in this city, speaks of certain clergymen, and namely Mr. Hugel among them, who, as it says: "seem to think they know such amazing things of God—of His money, power, purpose, etc., that one would naturally conclude they must be on terms of peculiar intimacy with the Creator. These clergymen." It says we are in error in our "Sky to find what His waste of us, and what He will do to us." We do not understand the meaning of the last clause, but we understand some believers have had a lot of small amount in the universe, as compared with them.

But there are, it seems, some sleazy, not sophisticated, who take us to be in such superstitious of priests, although given word for word in the language of Hor Writ, and Editor Owen of the Golden Gate, Spiritualist organ, is one of them.

He evidently thinks himself of great account in the universe, as seemed with satisfied and everybody else, and in his conceit actually pretends to understand the ways of God, and to appreciate the straight and narrow way spoken of in Scripture, and advocated by Mgr. Capel and the other sacred scribes. He would have this a part of go-as-you-please, scrub race, free to all, and the Devil take the hindmost. "They may believe," he says, "in one God or fifty, or none at all; they may believe the world was created 6,000 years, or none of age ago; and one man once down from an angel, perfect from the hands of his Creator, or up through the animal creation of a reptile or a monkey; they may, if it all the same with Editor Owen, believe in a God who is all love, and who will let all go to the devil, if they do not believe." and as good as the best. Nothing mean or narrow about him—he will take in all sorts and classes—even Mgr. Capel. If he is willing to waive the exclusive ideas and ways with this rabble, he, too, "all religionists, and all who are not religionists, Christians, Spiritualists, Pagans, and all with whom he meets, people," he informs, so "should be willing to live on the "broad plane" Owen, and "live in his Omnibus scheme of Salvation, and yet not it. It is not about five years ago he invented by a disreputable intruder, who engaged in the business of a Spiritualist, and who, under the direction of Jehovah, that the disciples of Christ was so good, it not better, than the obedient, and that he was willing to do as he so pleased. Mr. Owen disapproves of "familiarity with Unseen Powers," and is especially pleased to see familiar with God and His Word. The indications are, however, that he is very familiar, and the percentage attained to above we the originator of this scrub-race idea. Betting is not in our exactly, but we would not mind staking a hat not on the proposition that Editor Owen has got a special agency to push this idea, and that he is not the originator of it, and that the hand was that hundreds decreased to the job. His dark omens, the pretended materialization of disembodied spirits, and the other mere nonsense of mediums, are expected to help the work along. Bad omens to him, the master of his side. This superfilious Editor, in another sheet, expresses the opinion that the Christian, including "even the Roman Catholic Church," have been and are all of some use as a bugbear to frighten into decent behavior those who would be worse than they are if they would, and arbitrarily confiscate himself very magnanimous and generous, and, if necessary, would go to the world to our great aid, with no personal restraints or public honor Indemnity to protect from damage, yet he has a very hard time he can do is to "get religion and to get it good and strong." Through the Christian Church, he sees his work, "a serious stumbling block to progress and a great hindrance of progress, yet he is willing to allow that it has been of some service in a great plan to keep low grade of characters in order; "if a man cannot be kept straight from any higher motive than the fear of eternal torment in a lake of fire, in the life beyond, he is better off in this life for the fear of it, and we would if bound, don and it cries the.

The truth or falsity of eternal punishment is a thing to him. He supposes it is a mere bugbear to frighten naughty children with, but very good sometimes to that end. He shows by his conclusions and utterly unsympathetic character of the Christian religion, of which, he says, he knows them and by their fruits we judge them.

Take the heading, "What Spirits Teach." Mr. Owen gives what they are said to have said in the Spirit Land, at the mediumship of Mrs. Nellie J. T. Brigham, at a meeting of New York Spiritualists, and comments on it in a way very unsympathetic that shows it is not Christian, but—A tale of fire and brimstone such as the Rev. Dr. Talmage, at a meeting of New York, and, in comparison, "the Christian Church." Mr. Owen gives what they are said to have said. Nellie J. T. (FOR THE MONITOR.)

THE JUPITA PINE TREE.

Long are the lagions of the white leader
Grow strong within the West,
Or marks rain bulled, where the selfish leader
Pressed his mammon quest.

Where pines stood, it stately rank unbroken,
And on the dewy soil
No fields grew golden with the shining token
Of farmer's thrifty toil.

The free air freely will,
The blue sent his black robed hosts unhaunted,
His water unfolded.

They came—yet bore no types of tyrant power,
Nor sword, nor clashing chain;
They built in accomplishing for the headed dower
Of selfish greed and gain.

Nay! to the wild sons of the forest lonely,
Celestia bows the Lord's sweet service, only,
For Lord's reward, for Lord's sweet service, only,
With emotions till they wrought.

Around with the cross, they faced each scene of peril,
Nor sought well-earned repose
Till barren hearts, and wilderness starlit
Eve "blossomed as the rose."

And where the broad breast of the "Island ocean"
Shields what fair wealth the land
What rich soil—nourished crowned the brave
Of Lord Leopold band!

Pass those bright ranks, stark forth, O valiant leader,
Whose laurels men forget!
True knight of God! Salvation's ransom plider!
Brave, benevolent, true!

Thou pure Promethous! Heaven-commissioned
Of Faith's celestial fire!
Thou fellow-man of the present river,
The waters' mighty sire!

Yet, blight hatred fain would dim thy glory,
And pinches Time's fleeting fame,
While poesy dwells in beautiful song and story,
Thy name's worthiest name.

Best grateful Nature, of thy work sculpture
Had substantial, fair,
And, faulty essayed by faithful-valoed Tradition,
For fulsome tribute lies.

Where the fabled cities of West rise of sculpture
Fadeth her "island sea,"
Yea poor tome plaudited, by thy hand still render
Most gratitude to thee!

Year upon year—yes, robed in youth eternal
Their wonderous branches seem—
Each changing year brings forth their blossoms vernal,
Their summer's fruitage—gleam.

"The Jupita's pear-trees!" a'en the blest strangers
Then hoops their fillier sway—
Thy ever's hallowed, O! the great ranger,
Unconscious, grow thine fame!

O, height of God, and tender heart that pantest
For man's true weal alone,
By fadeless trees thy name are once planted,
Thy world-encircled name is known.

And, vicarious mark! to their birth place early
Thy name—true hero by which everything
On that one spot, with mystic splendor lonely
The footfall touches glow!

As if they said: "Let no atonement render
To him who man forgiven,
Nor slave-born growing, to remembrance tender
"Fire shrine our loved Magyrotis!"

And so, brave heart! the glory of the Mission
With bloom shall ever be blest,
Where Christ-worshiper, inscribed by fond Tradition,
The Jupita's mementos!

Hanover, M. Saturnoon (Marie).
San Francisco, Cal.

In the Indian territory of Detroit, Michigan, there is a dense, singularly fascinating and vigorous place, which, in the Indian Tradition inherited, was planted, two hundred years ago, by the great Indian Chief Jupita, and named after him. It is said by tradition, that the place was established, "on the 40th hours in the 40th year of the 40th Moon, in the 40th year of the 40th Moon." Jupita's pear-trees, which were then planted with peppered and right, for their blossoms richly, every Spring, are still standing, and are still bearing fruit, and are, in the aggregate, the most remarkable pear-trees in existence. One night nearly lengthy from this spot, the Jupita's pear-trees are seen

TWENTY-SEVEN YEAR OF PUBLICATION

THE MONITOR has the largest circulation of any Religious Paper published on the Pacific Coast.

WEDNESDAY AUGUST 19, 1885.

MISSION OF THE CATHOLIC PRESS.

"Journalism is the great moral power of the period, because it is the vital agent in popularizing ideas; and popularizing ideas means shaping opinions, and opinions governing the world. Journalism, therefore, is a power, and a power of the highest order, and it may be used for good or evil, according as it is wielded by a wise or foolish, a virtuous or a depraved hand. Having his life to lead and account for, through the instrumentality of St. Francis de Sales, under whose protection they wish to be placed, the writers of Catholic journals have a field before them, the extent of which is limited only by the extent of religion, for its defender, and principle with freedom and liberty.—Pius IX.

Editorial Notes.

— Dr. Mossman, famous for his connection with the Tractarian movement, died at Torrington, England, on July 6th. Before his death he was received into the Church, and departed this life holding a crucifix in his hands and invoking the names of Jesus and Mary.

— The Bishops of the country are taking great interest in the advancement of Catholic newspapers. Bishop Manderson, of Denver, has requested his priests to see that Catholics subscribe for the Colorado Catholic, published in that city, and send (sons of interest of the different parishes to the editor.

— The General Chapter of the Dominican Order has been convened to meet at Louvain on the 14th of September, under the presidency of the Right Rev. Father Larcon, the Master General. The delegates from St. Joseph's Province in the United States, will be Very Rev. M. D. Lilly, O. P., and Very Rev. E. J. Clarkson, O. P.

— According to the annual register of temperance laws now in force in Great Britain and Ireland, the following Irish acts will expire on the dates mentioned: Sale of Liquors on Sundays act, Dec. 31, 1885; Peace Preservation (Arms) act, June 1, 1886; Prevention of Crimes act, end of the present session. Laborers (Ireland) act, end of session or 1886.

— It is a fact worthy of notice that a great many of the exiled German Religious have found a new home in Holland, which three hundred years ago persecuted the Catholics with fire and sword. Thus the Jesuits, Redemptorists, Franciscans and Dominicans, besides a good number of secular Sisters of various congregations, have started episcopal establishments near the German boundary line.

— The Holy Father recently gave an audience to Mgr. Kirby, Rector of the Irish College in Rome, and to Mgr. Dillon, of Sydney, Australia, and mentioned to them among other things the fact that in the room where they then were a noted Protestant had owned to him that he had abandoned Freemasonry in consequence of become an exemplary Catholic.

"Young Ireland," is engaged in editing a confidential narrative written by Mr. Fredrick Lucas, M. P., on the true state of the political parties in Ireland they were sent to Pope Pius IX. It is thought that the article will throw great light on the negotiations which at that time existed between the government of Great Britain and the Vatican.

— The return is daily expected of Dr. Faupel, a graduate of the University of Louvain, who, for the last two years, has been studying at the Catholic Oriental University established by Leo XIII., at Bayrout in Syria, 1881. Dr. Faupel having mastered the Arabic language, will probably obtain an appointment on the staff at Louvain, and thence be even frequented by one that he may be selected as rector of the new Congo Seminary, the erection of which has been decided upon in connection with the Belgian University.

— The financial difficulties of the Diocese of Edinburgh, Scotland, being now arranged, it is believed that a Bishop of no long vacant See will soon be nominated. Mgr. Smith, Administrator of the Diocese, who has been living at the Scotch College in Rome for several months past, will, it is firmly believed, be chosen to fill this important See. Mgr. Smith is a profound Biblical scholar, and is recognized as such in a country which has produced so many adepts in that order of learning.

— The priests of the city—says the Cross and Shamrock—complain that too many Irish-Catholic girls are seeking husbands from among the Protestant and infidel young men of the community. This state of affairs is certainly deplorable, since mixed marriages, from time immemorial, almost invariably lead to the ruin of the Catholic party, and entail infidelity on the offspring. Then it is that many who were once pious young Catholic maidens and received Holy Communion once a month, are seen no more to approach the Holy Table of the Lord. Shame! shame!

— Our children should be virtuous as well as smart. And how can we have them good, unless we train them so? They won't be truthful because they are taught grammar, nor pure because they get geography lessons, nor obedient because they have algebra, nor honest because they have studied the spencerian system of penmanship. You cannot have them good unless you teach them goodness, and this is the theory of goodness but religion! Education that leaves out morality, is as likely to lead to the penitentiary as to the judge's ermine or the Christian's crown.

— Who established the first temperance society in America has long been a mooted question. The Catholic Citizen says that the honor of organizing the first temperance society on this Continent belongs to the Jesuits, and adds that in the year 1648 Jesuit missionaries gave a mission at Sillery, near Montreal, Canada, and after the celebration of Holy Mass one of the Fathers preached on temperance. The result was that Algonquin, with other chiefs and members of their tribe, organized a temperance society, and took the pledge to abstain from intoxicating liquors.

— The world has lost a regular iron-clad bigot in the death of Rev. Ironsea Prime, of the New York Observer. During his life he did all he could in his puny way to injure the Catholic Church, but he failed miserably, and now this he has doubtless discovered that even the gates of hell cannot prevail against the Church of God. The very malignant disease of cancer of the eternal God become when they have passed through the portals of Bolshoth's basement door!

— The robbery of the tomb of Pope Clement IV. at Viterbo, has induced the Government to make the following resolutions: The remains of the Pontiff shall be replaced in the sarcophagus from which they were taken; the Church of St. Francesco, which was about to be converted into a museum, is declared a national monument, and the important tombs of Popes and Cardinals which it contains will be allowed to remain there; but the objects taken from the dead body of the Pope, the ring, the glove, clasp of the cape and shoes, will be placed in a museum.

— A German periodical, in order to finally settle the question whether the mundane Abbe Liszt was a priest or not, has published the exact facts with Liszt himself as authority. After the composer resigned in 1859, the post of Court Kappelmeister to the Grand Duke of Saxe Weimar, he went to Rome and took up the study of theology. He only received the lower order of the consecrations, such as is frequently accorded laymen. "He is therefore," the journal states, "neither deacon nor sub-deacon and still less a priest, and has neither the rights nor the responsibilities of the higher clergy." He is not even bound to wear the clerical dress.

— The Boston Herald hopes that Lieutenant Howard, of the Connecticut militia, "who has been working a Gatling gun for the Canadian Government, for money, will be made to feel, when he gets home from the Northwest, that his conduct is not only unbecoming to a gentleman and a soldier, but such as to exclude him from the company of any military people, except Hessians." The pory militiaman, it seems, has been sporting his uniform in a foreign country and disgracing it by making a collection which he proposes to exhibit on his return. Connecticut has a pretty strong stomach, but we hope there is enough decency in the State to frown down that barbarous enterprise.

— According to the information given to the Christian Union by a large number of Protestant clergymen, not more than five per cent of American artisans in cities habitually attend religious services of any kind. All but two of the letters say that the attendance is diminishing, and all but one that the neglect is not from unbelief in Christianity. The cause of non-church attendance is said to be: The men have to work, they complain, more than those who were their fathers, and are therefore stay away. They think secret societies are as good as the church. They are unable to pay for the privileges because of the high prices of things which they must have. The large salaries of the ministers disgust some. Some feel that the minister is a hireling, and therefore cannot to uphold his church as a doctor seeks to increase his practice, not from love of souls, but because he enjoys his calling. Some officers of labor are so bad in their treatment of their employees that the men do not want to go where they shall meet those in whose real Christianity they have no little faith. All the letters indicate that especially in the large places artisans feel that they are not welcome, in churches frequented by well-to-do classes." And to this complexion hath Luther's invention come at last! It is only a question of time until the world is divided into two camps: Those who believe in God and are in the Catholic Church, and those who profess atheism. Protestantism is doomed to die of its own spiritual decay and to be buried beneath a monument of its own sins.

The Folly of Leaving Great Fortunes to Children.

It is often a question with men of great wealth what to do with it. If they have it in their children it generally proves their ruin. Here, for instance, says a New York correspondent, is a grandson of John J. Phelps who has just committed suicide. I remember John J. Phelps as a splendid business man, who persuaded wealth with an intense greed and left half down million. Such instances meet one at every turn in high life, and wealth so often proves only a road to ruin that the prospect is often painful. In this connection I may mention that Fifth avenue now contains two vacant houses side by side which recall the history of a distinguished family. One belongs (by purchase) to E. M. Morgan and the other has recently become his by inheritance. It was occupied by his grandfather (the late ex-Governor), and still later by his widow. The grandson closed up his establishment and started on an around the globe voyage in his yacht, accompanied by his wife and a few friends, and during his absence his grandmother died. As she had no other descendants, the house is left in charge of a housekeeper. It is sad to think that so noble a pair as the ex-Governor and his wife are gone never to return, and there is but little consolation in the prospective use to which their wealth will be devoted. With the exception of a few legacies, the equal to one-twentieth of the estate, it all goes to the present E. D. Morgan, who, on his return, will find the splendid house awaiting him, and also a few millions of spending money. When a young man is loaded with money it is almost sure to wish him. While young Ned Morgan has two elegantly furnished houses in the center of fashion, there are, on the other hand, 65,000 homeless wretches within walking throw of them, who are glad to find lodging at the station house.

A Sect whose Patron Saint is Judas!

Judas, as every Catholic knows, sold our Blessed Redeemer for thirty pieces of silver, and, when he had committed this worst of all crimes, he went out and hanged himself. Henry VIII. of England, seeing a chance by which the conquests of Judas might properly be transferred to his kingdom, set up a little one horse sect known as Episcopalians, who have been carefully excluding Judas for three centuries, until at last the world is beginning to realize the fact that this little band of make-believe Christians should adopt Judas as its patron saint!

When our Blessed Lord wanted Apostles for His Church he selected them from among the poor and lowly, but the English Episcopalians, when openly advertise the "advantages" which it offers to "bidders" for Bishoprics and parishes! This is another species of the shameful traffic which the "nation of haberdashers" has instituted to add greater lustre to its national infamy!

To such an extent has this abominable practice of selling Church Livings extended in England that the Pall Mall Gazette, the most honored representative of English Christianity concur, in school here by the clear-sighted and pure-minded men and women who sway the judgment and the sympathies of the American community. Our people know when squeamishness means modesty, and when it means hypocrisy, and they can see that depravity so ramified and continuous as that which runs in head in Parliament and brothels the metropolitan police can be dealt with only in one way, namely, by such merciless exposure as shall shame the courts of justice and the officers of Government into a resolute, impartial assertion of their purity power.

It is no less plain to those whose abhorrence of iniquity is genuine and who would safeguard our society from the pollution to be feared through the persistent misnomer of the British aristocracy, that for us as well as Englishmen the London scandal was a thing to be blurted out, not glared over, a thing to be unflinchingly laid bare in all its devilish significance and atrocious details, not excusedd, shrouded, and hushed up by vague, equivocal allusions and pitiless generalities. What our people needed to behold in this instance was the concrete gravamen of the charge, the text of the terrible indictment launched by the Pall Mall Gazette against the rich and titled profligates of London, that they may see and know for themselves and reform have continued to dominate and defile the British nation.

The details of the infernal organization whose existence has been conclusively established by the investigating Commission, are indisputable not only to a recognition of the vast, revolutionary import of the Pall Mall exposures, but also to a comprehension of the opportune and solemn warning which they should convey to us. Since the "Diamond Necklace" affair by uncovering the shocking impurity of Versailles dealt the fatal-stroke and crowning blow to the French ancien régime, Europe has behold no incident pregnant with more transcendent consequences than the imposition forced upon the British heart and conscience by the Pall Mall Gazette. Nothing but a foreign war, on which the nation's fate should be suspended, can block the work of expurgation and retribution now begun. War itself could but for a brief period postpone the ruthless demolition of the British aristocracy and the complete reconstruction of England's political and social fabric. It bodes ill for privilege and title, and for all the power and influence built upon priestcraft and peerage, that the infamous employment of these gifts will for some months to come be hunted from pulpit and from rostrum, until the lowly millions, whose soul autonom will be summoned for the first time to the ballot box, feel that at last God is on their side.

Here in this country we are, or trust we are, so yet unstained by such a scourge of organized stupefaction as has for years wrought havoc in the homes of London's poor. But how long can we reckon on such happy immunity from systematic devastation in presence of the myriad conjuncts to the multiplication of great fortunes, the tendency of the opulent and idle to aggregation in large cities, and their notorious propensity to emulate the luxury and the vice of foreign capitals? After all, if we look sharply at the facts, the upper class in England is less an aristocracy of birth than an oligarchy of wealth. Well, are there not parts of our country in which seem tied drifting into the etcheh of a plutocracy and who knows but New York, like London, may one day harbor some one who is upon the virtuous poor as the prey of their fool appetites, and who, could they compelle the British peerage to immunity of impunity, might essay the perpetration of like revolting crimes!

"Animal Man."

"Man, the work of God's right hand," said Archbishop O'Brien of Halifax, in a recent discourse, "being composed of a body that is visible, and an invisible soul, belongs partly to the material and partly to the spiritual order. He has, moreover, been raised by the will of his Maker to a supernatural state, having been endowed with an almost unlimited capacity for happiness, and fitted for the attainment of everlasting bliss. By reason of his material part man tends to earthly and sensual things; but on account of his spiritual soul he can never be satisfied with these, he longs for and aspires to something above and beyond the vulgar pleasures of the sense. It is a sad truth that many lead the lives of brutes, degrading their nature by living "according to the flesh," glorying, sometimes, in their shame; seeking to excuse their conduct by asserting that all are equally vicious. These "animal men," like those of whom St. Peter spoke, "who have walked in riotousness, lusts, excess of wine, revellings, banquetings and unlawful worshiping of idols" (1 Pet. iv.—3) are not and cannot be satisfied with these things; yet, do they, as the same Apostle speaks, "think it strange that you run not with them, speaking evil of you." They cannot see that in regard of nature of the soul man that is urged between the Holy and the spirit they weakly yield the victory to the flesh; they forget the warning words of the Apostle—"For if you live according to the flesh you shall die; but if by the spirit you mortify the deeds of the flesh, you shall live" (Rom. viii—13). Here for, alas! need those words; how many look upon them as mere empty sounds. "The animal man," living forgetfulness of the Eternal, sounds on every side. Hence it is that the world offers a premium for vice; the office of Holy Ministry is ridiculed "Israel," and the driveling sophistic is an "advanced thinker;" the miserable sophistries, the senseless jargon of materialism are hailed upon as deep philosophy; immoral publications find a ready sale; social honors are showered upon the successful swindler, and only the believers in God's Providence are held up to ridicule.

This is no overdrawn picture; it is no diseased imagination; it is a sad and sober truth. Let any man calmly look at the world, its modes of speech, and its harness, and he will see how little they are in accord with the Gospel of Christ, but how like to the state of the Gentiles, described by St. Peter, who have walked in the lusts, lusts, excess of wine, revelling, banqueetings and unlawful worshiping of idols."

The Great Heresies.

It is worthy of remark—says the Catholic Citizen—that six of the earlier heresies in the history of the Church should have arisen respecting the divine persons of the Godhead. The Arians (325) taught that Christ was inferior to the other persons of the Trinity. The Macedonians, (361) taught that the Holy Ghost was inferior. The Nestorians, (431) taught that there were two persons (not two natures) in Christ. The Eutychians (451) taught there was but one nature—the divine. The Monothelites (680) held that Christ had no human will. The Manichaeans (290 1218) taught that Christ did not assume a real human body, but merely appeared in one like the angels of the Old Testament.

The Pelagian heresy doubled the doctrine of original sin. The Iconoclasts opposed sacred images. And the heresy of Berengarius (1078) denied the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist.

The most sweeping heresy ever broached was that of the Albigenses. They denied all the sacraments, taught that there were two Gods, and proclaimed the resurrection of the body to be a myth.

The Waldenses and the Lollards (followers of Wycliffe) were much milder and more tolerable. They were partisans of the Middle Ages. The former taught that clergymen ought to own no property and that capital punishment was a crime. The latter held that while in mortal sin, a priest's functions were in abeyance. Both, however, added to these beliefs other and more revolutionary tenets. Wycliffe said that God approved sin, and that confession was sacred.

The heresies that had resulted in schisms are those which have defied the authority of the Roman See, viz. the Greek and Protestant heresies.

Catholic Reverence for the Holy Bible.

One of the illusions which unintentional Protestants labor under is the false impression that the Catholic Church does not reverence the Word of God with that order which Protestant sects profess for it. This false idea is generated in the Protestant mind by reason of the teaching of prejudiced preachers who purposely malign the Catholic Church in order to create a hospitable hatred against her in the breasts of those who are unfortunate enough to be under sectarian influences.

Laying altogether aside the well-known historical fact that only for the care which the Catholic Church took in copying and preserving the Sacred Scriptures, there would be no such book as the Bible known in the world to-day, the Church has preserved in its purity and in entirety the Word of God, and has ever shown it that special reverence due only to the result of divine inspiration.

The Church places the Holy Scripture prominently upon every altar where the Adorable Sacrifice of the Mass is offered to God; her priests are in duty bound to perform portions of it every day; the prayers recited by her laity are in great part taken from its pages; and in every sermon preached throughout the Catholic world, explanations of the Gospel and Epistles are given for the benefit of those who may not have the time or the capacity to read the Bible in their native tongue. Besides, the Church has approved of the publication of the Word of God in all the principal languages spoken by mankind, and many people are indebted for the faithful rendering of the Sacred Scriptures careful reading with becoming reverence, humility and pious disposition.

Unlike the contention which exists among the Protestant sects concerning the meaning of disputed texts of Scripture, every Catholic Bishop and priest in the world is of one mind on such matters. Protestant readers have the Word of God into letters in their disguise over every tongue, they with the dotages of fast young men. The evil example of this class is working incalculable injury to society.

Parents and those who have the care or guardianship of youth should never permit "fast young men" to enter their house. We fear that parents too frequently forget the duties they owe their children. We would remind them that, though this evil may not take immediate effect on the minds of duty in this respect, there is a higher, holier law, before whose dread tribunal they will have to render a strict account of the trust placed under their care.

— The academy of St. Rose, for the education of Catholic girls was dedicated at Wilmington, on the 17th inst., by the Rt. Rev. Bishop Chatard, in the presence of an immense congregation. The Bishop delivered an address, in which he indicated upon parents the import ance of a Catholic education. The building is of brick and cost $16,500.

Flowers at Funerals.

The senseless and Pagan custom of strewing flowers at funerals is beginning to surfeit even the sensible people among the non-Catholic community, and we notice in many of the Eastern secular papers articles denunciatory of this cheap and meaningless method of proclaiming pretended grief by presenting emblems of joy in memory of departed friends. A writer in the Philadelphia Press proclaims the glad tidings that this custom is "on the wane" and adds:

"I remember, he says, "that at Harney Williams' funeral, at a moderate estimate, the flowers sent cost between $2,000 and $3,000. Every conceivable form was utilized—urns, crosses, harps, lyres, baskets, pillows—everything that the most ingenious florist could devise, was put into use on this occasion, and the altar and chancel were fairly packed and nonoaded by the wealth of development in this line. Well, it was simply ridiculous, and, by the way, it is a good point for purchasers of emblems of this nature to see that they accurate common sense and discretion in their orders. Let me give you an illustration.

A short time ago a young fellow, an actor, died suddenly, and his acquaintance, desiring to testify their regard, determined to send something of this nature to his home at the time of the funeral service. So, raising $50 or $60, they sent one of their number to an adjacent florist's and revealed their desire. The man was pleased in the name of the company to be the contributor of their friend. Having paid for it, that ended their mission.

They attended the service in a body, and, to their horror and amazement, they found—their former associate having been a Hebrew—that they had sent a piece in the way so that it could not be seen, a huge red cross, probably the most offensive thing that could have been sent to a Hebrew home under any circumstances. The parents of the actor were, fortunately, people of sense and at once saw the blunder was caused by ignorance rather than with any intent to annoy or affront, so they quietly put the offensive symbol out of the way where it couldn't be seen.

In all childhood the same cross was sent next day to some Christian home of the dead, and thus the faux pas was disguised by a Jew was made to do double duty.

Catholics, more than any other people, should stamp out this sinful shadow of the Paganism of the past. Half dead should receive more prayers and less pomp, more alms and less wreaths, more of God's religion and less ridiculous floral offerings which do almost simultaneously with the dead they are sent to "homes," and which are designed more for display than for the following the funeral.

To flowers, but plenty of Masses and prayers from my Catholic friends," should be the last dying request of every good Catholic, so as to put an end to this worse than absurd custom which even the Chinese do not indulge—preferring solid food to senseless flowers.

The Sin of Missing Mass on Sunday.

We sincerely hope that among all the readers of the MONITOR there is not one who wantonly misses mass as sense on Sunday. We say wantonly, because there are good and sufficient reasons for not hearing Mass on Sunday. God, who so elevated a sacrifice is the Holy Mass that not even the pen of an angel could describe the celestial glory of the Holy Sacrifice which is offered up on the Altar. The Mass is a continuation of the sacrifice of the Son of God on Calvary the same, mysterious difference being in the manner. The Mass, therefore, shows and beyond all other systems of devotion, is the most sublime and acceptable form of divine form of sacrifice that Christians can offer to God. "Ubi single Mass," says St. Thomas, "as as much advantage as if he had assisted at all the masses of the world." Yet, the Sacrament will be of no avail to its favor, as its benefits are dependent on the state of the soul. Its efficacy is to be judged by the manner of the sacrifice. We have mentioned. The book can be had direct from the Publisher, or through A. Wallbridge, 797 Market street.

Farm and Home.

Fruit-Eaters Need no Doctors.

We were struck recently by the remarks of a doctor friend of ours, who said no one thing will do so much to make people independent of the medical profession as the daily free use of fruit. He had noticed that those farmers in whose families fruit was regularly and largely consumed seldom needed his services. We thought what a long step toward freedom from the doctor would be accomplished if these fruits. It is a deplorable fact that farmers' families do not enjoy that robust health that country air and out-door life, with plenty of exercise, should give.

It is also a fact that, living on farms where rich acres are asking to produce abundant crops of the varied fruits, but very few have plenty, and many never have any fruit, except it may be an occasional apple. The standard food in a large majority of farmers' homes consists largely of bread, butter and meat, mostly pork fried in grease, and where pastry or cake is used, it has lard in large proportion in its composition; and this food is eaten at least twice, and, in many families, three times a day, year in and year out. Is it any wonder that they are not more healthy, and that their prevailing diseases are such as indicate an over-consumption of greasy food? If fruits were expensive or difficult to raise, there would be some excuse; but there is no part of the country without plenty of varieties adapted to its soil and climate, and just such as are fitted by nature to both nourish and cleanse the body, and no more skill is required to grow them than to grow corn and wheat.—Rural New Yorker.

Who First Canned Fruit.

We are indebted to Pompeii for our great industry of canned fruits. Years ago when the excavations were beginning a party of American found, in what had been the pantry of a house, many jars of preserved figs. One was opened, and they were found to be fresh and good. Investigation showed that the figs had been put into the jar in a semi-liquid state, a preservative being left for the steam to escape, and then sealed with wax. The hint was taken, and soon after fruit canning was introduced here the process being identical with that in vogue at Pompeii twenty centuries ago. There are many fallen among us who can tomatoes and peaches for dessert, and we do not doubt that they are indebted for this art to the people of Pompeii.

A Chapter of Household Rent's.

Don't stand when you can sit just as well. Don't put off the mending from week to week.

Don't you know that vinegar will clean the kingdom in the stove doors?

Don't you know that your floor oil cloths can be washed in buttermilk or beaten?

Don't give little children two languages to learn—first baby talk, then afterwards true pronunciation.

Don't hesitate to place nice on the live coals in the stove, it will clean out the stove pipe.

Don't throw away nice woolen stockings when the feet are worn out but cut them down for the children.

Don't fail to be clean and tidy in every nook and corner, but don't be a slave to a shining stove or carpet.

Don't let unnecessary work bounce your grandmother did. There was not half so much to be done in her day.

Don't cheatch the idea that you will catch cold if you feel a bit of fresh air or know there is an outlet for foul tainted air.

Don't allow your children to think that not new clothes for the sake of fashion holders, serving a better purpose than loops to hang by.

Don't fret dirt from one place of furniture to another and call it dusting, but take it carefully up in a dusting cloth and shake it from the window.

Don't say "micky" for milk, "relaxy" for relax; baby will understand "bad mamma your little dress" as readily as if yousaid "being its little dress to its mamma."

Don't talk sentiment or family matters in callers, and don't tell them the exact date of their last call. They will be likely to make the interval longer the next time.

Don't let your heart that you have got destroyed by adding three or four teaspoonfuls of kerosene to a watering pot if used freely where the bugs appear!

Don't fail in conversation to occasionally repeat and gives the listener an opportunity to speak, and don't mistake polite listening prolonged, for interest in your subject.

Don't lose a moment of the day; finish one piece of sewing before commencing another; don't fail to so plan the work that several things may be attended to at the same time.

Don't fail to rest yourself during a day's sewing by changing your seat occasionally, and in warm weather don't fail to remember that washing the face and hands will be found very refreshing.

Don't sit over the stove with the feet in the oven, complaining of being cold, but draw nearly and take a brisk walk in the open air, when you will think the fire has a fresh start, or the weather has abated.

Dime Novels.

Mothers, look out for the dime novels. No poison more insidious could be introduced into your homes. Keep the mind's health as carefully protected as you do the body's, and the State Reform School will not open its door to close them for years upon one of her darlings. A mother's boy in Montreal, only fourteen years old, was recently fastened in a $300 forgery. He and two companions were shoot starting for New York, and had about thirty dime novels in their possession. A boy in Thaddeus Stevens public school at Philadelphia, when reprimanded by his teacher recently, drew a revolver and threatened to shoot her. This led to a search of the pupils when seven revolvers were captured from boys about ten years old. About one hundred and twenty dime novels were discovered to be the property of the youthful desperadoes.

Home Conversation.

Nothing in the home life needs to be more carefully watched and more diligently cultivated than the conversation. It should be imbued with the spirits of love. No bruise word should be spoken. The language of husband and wife, in their intercourse to perfect, should always be tender. Anger in word or even in tone should never be suffered. The warmth and tenderness of their hearts should flow out in every word that they speak to each other. As parents, too, in the intercourse with the children, they should never speak in a tone of scolding or like gentlemen. It is a fatal mistake to suppose that children's lives can grow up into beauty in an atmosphere of strife. Harsh angry words are to their sensitive souls what frost is to flowers. To bring them up in the nurture of the Lord is to bring them up in a Christ blessed world, and surely that world be with infinite tenderness. The blessed influence of loving speech day after day and month after month, it is impossible to estimate. It is like the falling of warm spring sunshine and rain on the garden. Heavily and sweetness of character are likely to come from such a home.—Catholic Home.

Family Fun.

Romance of the Soda Fountain.

The day was hot. In she came smiling familiarly, and languidly seated herself before the fountain.

"A glass of soda-water please."

"Yes, madam. What syrup? We have lemon, orange, raspberry and vanilla.

"I'll take a little straw berry, please."

"Beg pardon. We have lemon, orange, raspberry and vanilla.

"I have a little pineapple, please."

"Beg pardon, madam. I have now twice informed you that we have only lemon, orange, raspberry and vanilla.

"O yes, so you did! Well, please mix me a little lemon and orange and a little raspberry, a dash of vanilla, and you might also put in some acid phosphate and about a teaspoonful of cream." She sipped, laid down five cents, and remarked: "Soda water is very expensive, isn't it?"

The soda clerk's foam half as much as the druggist while he was counting his hundred (Franklin.)

"Yes, madam, very expensive. If you figure up the cost of these four syrups, the acid phosphate, and the cream, you can form an idea."

"Ah, indeed!" she replied; but you have forgotten the main sense of expense."

"Main sense of expense, madam?"

"Yes, sir. The cost; for you must consume an awful lot of it to keep up the fire consumed by your soda-water fountain."

And with one of her "nicest" smiles she and her rosacea departed—and the clerk in the village boomed two.

The Minister and the Sausages.

A minister in one of our orthodox churches, while on his way to preach a funeral sermon in the country, called to see one of his members, an old lady, who had just been making sausages, and as she felt very proud of them, insisted on the minister taking some of the best home with him. After wrapping the sausages in a cloth the minister carefully placed his bundle in the pocket of his great coat. Thus equipped, he started for the funeral. While attending the solemn ceremonies of the grave some hungry dogs scented the sausage, and were long in tracking them to the pocket of the good man's overcoat. Of course this was a great annoyance, and he was several times under the necessity of kicking the whelps away. The obsequies of the grave completed, the minister and the congregation repaired to the church, where the funeral discourse was to be preached.

After the sermon was finished the minister halted to make some remarks to his congregation, when a brother, who wished to have an appointment given out, mounted the stairs of the pulpit, and gave the minister's coat a hitch to get his attention. The divine, thinking it a dog having designs on his pocket, raised his foot, gave a sudden kick, and sent the good brother sprawling down the steps. "You will excuse me, brethren and sisters," said the minister, confusedly, and without looking at the work he had just done, "for I could not avoid it. I have sausage in my pocket, and that dog has been trying to grab them ever since he came upon the premises!"

She Ordered the Glass Filled.

It was at dinner on Sunday, and Mrs. Hendricks, the landlady, had sent out for a pitcher of beer.

"I am very fond of beer," remarked Dummy, as he drained his glass, "but I find that, when eating, instead of satisfying my appetite it tends to take it away."

"Is it possible?" said the landlady, in simplicity.

Wonder.

"What I maintain is this," said Mr. Whiffles, cheerfully; at the age of 60, or thereabouts, I can do what I please."

"Take my own case, for instance. I am 60, gentlemen, and have held every social life. I have travelled widely and read deeply; I have got down the marvels of nature, art, and mechanics at family meetings in progress in every shape with emotion and awe; but I cannot be troubled. My curiosity was not a matter of choice, I have no longer the power. Remarkable inventions, adventures and theories assets a certain pleasant feeling in me, but it is not wonder. Even the doings of crazy fanatics, either moral, political or religious, cannot move me to wonder. I am beyond it, and I don't know whether to be sorry or not. You may depend upon it that to be a man of 60 wonder is a thing of the past."

Here a neighbor looked into the coffee room and said: "Mr. Whiffles, your wife asked me to step down and say that she particularly wanted you to go home at once."

Mr. Whiffles drank his glass of cold without hurriedly, and as he got his hat into his hat exclaimed: "Now I wonder what the deuce she wants!"

He was a Cauty Dog.

"Expect they had some fun pepe up at the Chouncy dog show," remarked a gentleman from Ibho, "but I have a dog at home I wouldn't trade for the best of 'em."

"What breed is he?"

"Don't know exactly, but call him a cauty."

"Cutlin, you mean?"

"No, I mean just what I say—cauty. Money wouldn't tay that dog. He's a cur, but we couldn't keep house without him. You see, several years ago, I turned him to bait at the railway trestle as they passed our house. That's his sole business—barking at trains. He does just what he set up, especially at coal trains. Well, he subsys the railroad so that every freeman and brakeman on the road has sworn to kill him. Oh, he's a valuable dog.

"I can't see where the value comes in."

"You can't! Well, you could if you was in my place and had all the coal you could burn and some to sell thrown right off at your back door, free of cost."

A Hint to Wives.

Wife (at the breakfast table)—What time was it when you came in last night, dear? Husband (with an aching head)—Waller, I don't know, sastly.

Wife—It must have been 3 o'clock. Were you detained at the office?

Husband—Yo-yes.

Wife (anxious)—I'm afraid you are working too hard, dear. You ought not to kill yourself so closely to business. I am not surprised that you have a headache on Sunday in the morning. You really must take better care of yourself. By the way, can you tell me how a twenty dollar? Husband—Certainly, with pleasure.

Following Directions.

Culprit—Yes, sah, I took de chicken. I was gwineter make some chicken pie, and I took de cook book and read de receipt, and hit says: "Take one chicken." Hit didn't say, "Go an' buy one chicken, or leary one chicken, but take one chicken. Hit don't say whose chicken nor take, so I jest took de first one I could lay my hah's on. I followed de directions, sah, in de book.

Don't Whine Boys.

Don't be whining about not having a fair chance. Throw a sensible man out of a steeple, and he'll fall on his feet, and act the nearest way to his work. The more you have to begin with the less you have in the end. Money you can earn yourself is much brighter than any you get out of dad now's bags. A smart breakfast in the morning of life's work the appetite for a feast later in the day. He who has tasted a sour apple will gnaw the more relish for a sweet one. Your present want will make future prosperity all the sweeter. Eighteen pence earned in money a peddler's business, and he has turned it over until he has kept his earnings. As for the place you are cast in, don't feel fault with that, you needn't be a hoe because you were born in a stable. If dull toned a man of needle sky high, he could drop down in a good place. A hard working young man will his wife about his will make money while others will do nothing but lose it.

We love his work, and know how to spare.

Man for man is nothing else.

As to a little trouble, who expects to find cherries without stones, or roses without thorns? Who would wish to have heart to bear. Idleness lies in bed sick with the ague, while industry dodgs death and wealth. The dog in the kennel barks at the hunting party and cries out when it is all over. Laziness waits till the grass is dry, and never gets to market; "dry," swims it and makes all the money. "Don't do it" would not eat the bread cut on him. "Try" made meat out of mushrooms.

Guard Against Vulgar Language.

There is an intimate connection between the words and the thoughts of a man, between the thoughts and the actions. The latter is only an expression of the former, and they have the power to react upon the soul and make it more or less corrupt. Language is a very fine instrument, and, if used with care, it can be made to produce the most exquisite harmony, and to exert a most powerful influence upon the minds of others. Nobody has succeeded before, and it is not likely that he will succeed after, a vulgar or profane word has not only shown that there is a foul spot upon his mind, but he has appropriated that word he extended that spot, and influence it, till by much gonne, it will pollute and ruin the soul. He sendeth out of his mouth an evil thing. If you can control the tongue, that no improper words are pronounced by it, you will soon be able to control the mind, and save it from corruption. You extinguish the fire by smothering it, by preventing bad thoughts having utterance. Never utter a word anywhere which you would not have to speak in the presence of the most refined female or the most virtuous man. Try this practice a little while, and you will have command of yourself. Try it.

Women of Worth.

Man marry the rattle-brains of society. They choose the pretty, good for nothing girls, for that is what they call them. They prize after and marry the thoughtful girls, the good people, and generally has a much better time than the boy who is continually fretting and snarling, or playing and hindering others from work. The boy who is obedient and trustworthy will have his true friends to the other's one, and never need fear that he is alone in this world. The friends will be of the kind who will always speak a good word for him, and who will be interested with anything, the contrary notwithstanding. The boy who is constant anything, it is not so. He may have friends, but they are those who are in the same way in the industrious boy. As you read this for a week or two, take to the cream of New York or the Boston Bean Pot, and see if it does not do you good. Try it, and if you do not find that you are on the right track, I will be surprised.

The Boys Who Don't Care.

"My son you are wasting your time playing with that kitten. You ought to be studying your lesson, and you'll black boots if you do not study."

"Why, mother, what for?"

"Here care will run that child," said the mother to herself, "I will teach him a lesson he will not forget."

The boy observed, but idlely rushed into the house shouting:

"Mother, I want my dinner."

"I don't care," replied his mother.

Jamie was puzzled. His mother had never spoken to him in this way before, so he thought, when he spoke again.

"Mother I want something to eat."

"I don't care," was the cool reply.

"Mother, I shall be down be over, mother, I shall starve if I don't get some dinner," cried Jamie.

"I don't care."

This was too much for the poor boy to bear. He burst into tears.

"My son I want you to feel the folly of this and of the other things you do for others. Suppose I really did not care for you, what would you do for your dinner, clothing, for an education? Who, I ask you, would stop saying, 'I don't care.'"

James had never looked on this and his mother's side before. He promised to better, and after receiving a piece of pie, he set off to school a wiser if not a better boy.

A Circus Elephant's Punishment.

The huge elephant Albert, belonging to the Sanger Circus, lodged in the village of McCormick, (professionally known as James Island) Monday night, and on July 18, Rooney's baby, enclosed in an elegant coffin, was shipped to his relatives at Mauch Chunk. The entire company, headed by the principal baggagging appropriate airs, followed the baby to the depot and paid the respects to their dead comrade, at 11 o'clock. The funeral procession was a long one, and the sympathy was witnessed by many people.

Following the afternoon performance of the Sanger's, Mr. James S. Hutchinson, one of the managers, announced that as the elephant had taken human life he should be shot immediately after the performance and requested any members of the Forepaugh party who might be in the audience to report to their proprietor at the close of the circus tent. At 5:30 p. m. the giant Albert, with his keeper, was led out by the band trainers. Arrangements and Nerve were made to catch the beast. Inside of thirty three minutes the menagerie followed by three rifle men and a crowd of people, the elephant was shot down. The procession passed a long distance, and the rifle men were some over the river. Here the elephant was entirely chained and the rifle men were some large trees and the riflemen were drawn up in line fifteen paces from his head and side.

Perry Arrington, the trainer, drew a chalk line around the animal's heart and one behind the ears as targets for the sharpshooters. The command "Ready, aim, fire!" was given. Arrington said "Albert," the monster raised his head in obedience to the command of his keeper and as the word "fire" accompanied by the report of the rifles, the military rifles rang out, the animal fell dead in his chains without struggle or cry. The execution was witnessed by 2,000 people, who gave a great shout as the man-slayer fell. Albert was an old circus and band and leader of the performers for years. He was mad in one of his moods and this quite recently been considered one of the safest of the band.

MOST REV. ARCHBISHOP GROSS.

His Visit to Mt. Angel.—Reception by the Clergy and Laity.—A Day of Great Joy.

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR:

Dear Sir—The Most Rev. Archbishop Gross, accompanied by Rev. Father Adelhelm, Prior, O. S. B., arrived in Mt. Angel Saturday, July 25, at 5 o'clock p. m. The news of his arrival of the train, the procession was got in order, and when the train ran in the Mt. Angel brass band, under the direction of Rev. Father Barnabas, O. S. B., played a most beautiful march in welcome to his Grace. When his Grace had stepped off the car above his loving children, Very Rev. Father Prior asked his Grace in an emphatic manner to show the devoted people surrounding the depot the true way to Heaven, of the sanctuaire had led his Grace on the strait narrow gauge to Mt. Angel, his Grace, with a voice full of sweetness, replied that he knew of no other way to Heaven than that taught by the Church, of the good people to their shepherds and though he could not give them a free ticket to Heaven, still, as the representative of Christ in Oregon, he would tell them what to do to purchase one and would address them at the monastery, i. e., the Benedictine Church. In then the procession moved on headed by the banner. The order was as follows:

Vegas, dressed in white; the married ladies; your boy brass band; Benedictine lay Brothers; Benedictine priests; his Grace and Very Rev. Father Prior in a chariot, and then the non married people of the parish and others. The order of procession was conducted in a most orderly manner and the people, in a most orderly manner was conducted into the church, the choir singing Gloria in Excelsis. Very Rev. Father Prior gave a very touching address of welcome. His Grace, at first expressed his joy and great pleasure of being among the sons of the Patriarch, St. Benedict, "Among the Benedictines," he said, "I feel like one among his children." I have heard they have no greater friend on earth than Archbishop Gross. The expression of his feelings the heart of every Benedictine with increased fervor and zeal. I am a stranger to you personally, but you may be assured I will find no more faithful friends than the Benedictines." Then he gave the people what the Pontiff delivered to his second address. In the evening a monster torchlight procession took place in his honor.

The second day of the convention was opened with a great function. Mass in commemoration of deceased benefactors. The only subject that provoked any spirited discussion was a resolution to extend the centennial celebration, next September, to commemorate the establishment of the first temperance organization in New England. Some of the delegates did not over to afflicts with other organizations into which prohibition shows which organization would be entitled to a party. The following officers were elected: President, the Rev. James M. Cleary, Lowell, Mass.; Vice President, Rev. J. J. Conroy, Worcester, Mass.; Treasurer, Rev. James A. Scollan, Pittsfield, Ohio; Secretary, Philip A. Nolan, Philadelphia, Pa. At the banquet in the evening toast which was the cause of the convention, speeches were made by the Hon. Roger Sherman Baldwin (of Conn.), Prof. Amos Cleary, (Gov. Harrison, Mayor Holcomb, John C. Campbell of Philadelphia, Alexander Troup of New Haven; Dank O'Reilly of Pittsburgh, Pa., Rev. Father Ryan, Mobile, Ala., Rev. Father Ryan, Mobile, Ala., Rev. Father Crystal of Sandusky, Ohio, and the Rev. Father Dillon of New York.

THE WEEK'S NEWS
—FROM—IRELAND.

IRISH NEWS BY MAIL.

Antrim.—The Commission for the county of the town of Carrickfergus, was opened in the Record Court of the County Courthouse, on July 27, by Justice O'Brien, who, in addressing the Grand Jury, said there was no criminal business to go before them, and he congratulated them on the peaceful character of their county. Mr. R. Kelly, the sub-sheriff, then presented him with a gold-headed cane, as a mark of the esteem of the gentlemen of the county.

Armagh.—His Grace, the Primate, the Most Rev. Dr. McGettigan, is at present sojourning at Greenore, enjoying the delightful sea breezes from the Irish sea. The health of his Grace is as yet very delicate, and the apostolic work of the Primate of all Ireland, he fears, that will very soon cease to be undertaken.

Carlow.—Lady Harriet Kavanagh died, on July 19th, at her residence, The Lodge, Ballycraigy, aged 81 years. The deceased was the second daughter of Richard, second Earl of Clonmore, and married, in 1826, Colonel the Hon. F. of Kilmacarty, the final descendant of the McMurroughs, monarchs of Ireland. The family of Kavanagh here the name of McMurrough, but in 1171 that of Kavanagh was given to Donnall, son of Dermot McMurrough. His name Eva married Strongbow, Earl of Pembroke. In the reign of Mary, Cahir McArt Kavanagh married Alice, daughter of the Earl of Kildare, Lord Lieutenant; his Grace and Very Rev. Father Prior to a chariot, and then the non married people of the parish and others. The order of procession was conducted in a most orderly manner and the people, in a most orderly manner was conducted into the church, the choir singing Gloria in Excelsis. Very Rev. Father Prior gave a very touching address of welcome. Cork.—The Most Rev. Dr. Croke, Archbishop of Cashel, accompanied by the Most Dr. Gross, Bishop of Limerick, arrived in Queenstown, on July 28th, on a visit to Dr. MacCarthy, Bishop of Cork. When in Queenstown, the prelates were made to present him with an address of welcome. His Grace having received the address, and thanked the gentlemen, passed into the town amid the cheers of the people, who had gathered in great numbers to see the prelates. The address was presented by the Mayor, Mr. Sullivan, who, in addressing the prelates, said the people of Queenstown were proud to have the honor of being the first to welcome the illustrious successor of the Apostles, and the Prince of the Church. In the afternoon at five o'clock there was Pontifical Vespers.

The following day, the Feast of St. Alphonsus, there was a Pontifical High Mass. Very Rev. Father Prior, Arch-deacon Glay, Father Jeremiah, O. S. B., Sub-deacon, and Rev. Father Wenger, O. S. B., Master of Ceremonies. During Mass the Grace delivered a most eloquent sermon on the Real Presence of Our Lord in the Most Blessed Sacrament as the source of all that is good in the spiritual order. Vespers, from the Feast of St. Alphonsus, and Benediction followed, and the day was spent in a manner by which the people will long remember the day. His most striking address was on the glorious Mother of Jesus. In fact, his Grace is one of the most celebrated orators. He perfectly avoids the imitation of the audience. I say even more regarding the sermon of his Grace. Success has most distinct pronunciation and most excellent delivery. Many, in the Church, are enthusiastic in eloquence would be similar to the little pretended bishop who, in the fable, thought the crow had to hide made in the mind. Then regarding situation—his very in spite of his modesty, respect and affection even of unbelievers. We have heard Protestants and Freethinkers say: "He is a great orator; who can resist his soothing arguments." In the afternoon we went to the Cathedral and heard His Grace preached again a magnificent sermon on the glorious Mother of Christ, towards the Mother of God. We proved and illustrated by logical arguments and most appropriate comparisons, as examples, the necessity of devotion towards the Mother of God.

In the evening his Grace was accended by the Most Reverend Dr. Gross, Bishop of Limerick, Chinese hand, with their peculiar musical instrument, and, after the beautiful procession. Fine fireworks on the western side of the monastery completed the day's festivities. Very Rev. Father Prior, Arch-deacon Glay, Father Jeremiah, Father Wenger, Brothers Bernard and Ignatius, for the splendid entertainment. From the beginning of the day to the end, everything was perfect and very enjoyable, and, by making the most of the occasion, the people will long remember the day. His Grace had to stop in the morning and in the afternoon, for through laughing. It was about 10 o'clock when his Grace retired from all good nights.

Monday evening a grand concert was given by the Benedictines in the Monastery in honor of his Grace. It is expected that the proceeds, and stated that he ever so much appreciated all they had of his kind, and, in conclusion, he gave each with. At 11 o'clock the door prelate retired to his room, and the people dispersed to their homes, in company with Very Rev. Father Prior, who, on Tuesday, left for the Benedictine Abbey in Mt. Angel. On the Feast of St. Alphonsus, August 2nd, his Grace Most Rev. Archbishop Gross, assisted by Rev. Father Oswald, Sub-deacon, Father Benedict Wyrtzen, Deacon, and Rev. Father Prior, O. S. B., and the Benedictine Order of the Holy Cross, Mass, in the Benedictine Church. Mass was sung by the vicar-general of the Lord.

Your truly,

MONSIGNOR CAPEL AT GALT.

Two Interesting Discourses by the Distinguished Divine.

Two rare left Sacramento at 9 o'clock Sunday morning, the 9th inst., under charge of W. J. O'Brien, to go to Galt, where the distinguished Mr. Capel was announced to deliver two lectures, one in the morning at 10 o'clock, and the other in the afternoon at 7. Additional passenger cars were taken on at Brighton, Florin, Arcadia and Elk Grove, and Galt was reached about 10:20. A platform had been erected along side a little summer house in Dr. Harvey's garden and quite a commodious tent was built over and fitted up.

The Monsignor came in the afternoon from the residence of Mr. Hamilton, where he had been entertained by Mrs. Lida I. Church, Mrs. Addie Cather, (L. H. Theale and Signor Jacchini, with Miss Linda Griffin as accompanist, to a dense appreciative music. At the conclusion thereof, the Monsignor came, and read the parable of the Publican and the Sinner, and then gave a portion of some Epistle, which, to tell the truth, the reporter did not catch, for he was at 9:45 on intent on studying the man so wonderful face to listen to the words that fell from his lips. The gist of the language was about as follows:

All real Christians profess a belief in Jesus. The sense of Christian is a most obvious phrase. It is a term which implies a belief in Christ. He was so well known to us, that we feel we are deserving of the name—for it is impossible to lose the name of Christian—and yet to be a Christian. The sense of Christian in the first place was used in derision. It implied that men were the followers of the one Master. In the Scriptures, "Who is Christ?" people are made to a painful difficulty. A vast number of people profess to believe in Christ, and yet have never seen, nor, but the Holy Word tells that Jesus was, is now and will be forever. If in a false position, he must be in the wrong. However, if we may be, yet purity is the rod that covers the highest honor on earth.

Christianity proclaimed indissoluble unity between man and God. The faith for our age and divorce is the country are begotten of the Christian faith, and the Christian faith is the source of childhood. Christianity proclaimed that man was a being of dignity. It is the beauty in its true pedestal.

Christ proclaimed the gifts was so more than the Christian faith. Christianity proclaimed that the freedom of the world. The Christian faith is the only religion which has taught that the Son, who came to seek and to save, was God. Christ was not a man, but God, the Son. Christ was God. He came to save the world. He came to every human life was the God of Heaven and it will be found in the course of glory. There must be in us the spirit of obedience—the spirit of the word of God, believe it all He has said. Men are carried away by every wind of doctrine, and, in consequence, they lose their Christ's teaching. Follow Christ! Christ is the shadow of the land of the weary.

We must start God's law, and lay our lives according to the Gospel, and we will be happy. We must act by our hearts as wealth and worship God. The faith of our fathers Christ stood out in need of our services, and yet we have little life to a person who is weak. There is but one thing, and that is virtue and Christ.

We must, to sum up, in following of Christ, be a people who are the salt of the earth, and by sacrificing, and shows the Christian life. We will lear the name of Christian. We will be a people that will be a people who are Christians, and we will be a people who are Christians, and we will be a people who are Christians, and we

THE ASSUMPTION.

Thy long weary toils is ended,
Thy Mission on Earth it is done,
And sweet as the perfume of flowers,
Then art rising, Oh! beautiful one.
Thy face shineth brighter than sunbeams,
And a halo encircles thy brow,
Like the silvery moonlight's soft glory,
In the light that surrounds thee, to-all out:

"Hoya! Cushlamachree! Hoya!"
Laughs in the bosom of Erin,
Thy mother who gave Him His birth!
Who had tenderly guarded His footsteps,
In the years that had long ago passed,
And with breaking heart shared in His sorrows
And had stood by the Cross'foot the last!

Ah! no; and He cometh in glory,
To take her away to His home,
By the beautiful mansions of Heaven
Where sorrows and death never come,
Bright legions of angels surround them,
Singing softly their anthems of love,
While cupbyre of Eden Rose O'er them,
As He beareth His loved one above.

Saintly bands are awaiting to welcome
The Queen of the Heavens and Earth,
And the vaulted domes, proud and resplendant,
Re-echo the melodious strain:
But, hush! Heaven's calm noon are open,
And the choirs of angels pass thereon
Which is Julie Tone Delapath,
As yore as the morning's bright dew!

To thy Queen; to the throne He has led her,
And the crown He has placed on her brow;
Oh! angelic Immaculate bright! pulsing,
Heaven holds Earth's best treasure now.
Thy mission is ended, thy pilgrimage over,
Thy closed grandeur cards of joy
Let your welcome ring round your beautiful Queen
As she sits crowned glory on high.

We, too, would unite one poor voice
In offering a tribute of praise,
And the hope is the object of our desire
Will still be our grandest of festival days.
Remember, oh! queen of virgins,
That Earth was the land of thy birth
That she gave to mankind Saviour of Heaven
Its fair Queen, of infinite worth.

Then our hearts are ever offering
A share to thy love, and thy prayers;
Thou ever we ask you to aid us,
As we mount up life's steep, rugged stairs,
Then oh! turn not away from our pleading,
But guide us to that haven of rest,
Where we hope to be saved through the saps to come
And joins the fair Queen we love best.

SORRY.

Form of the Conscientious Judge of Pale
Will crush the footsteps of the virtuous breast,
Without pitiful pleasure and sharp sorrow't just Leaving gaspent hearts—full, desolate.
And as one sun of sun, yesterday the pale—
Of mortal self, shall wieldy, calm—
Consider fed Heaven in blissum heart—
For gray-haired orphanhood. No'er again
Pity's wand of love will cool
For age is mortgaged to regret and care.

An Irish Girl's Love.

A Story of the Country Kilkenny.

The county assizes had commenced in my native town, when a new batch of Irish tiffin arraigners were brought in prisoners to the county gaol of Kilkenny. They had not all only the previous evening a gentleman's house for the purpose of robbing it of arms—had been captured by the police, who, even of their behaviour, by a sudden fit of them. Lives were lost on both sides.

[illegible] and bookies to the common cars of the country. Some of them were wounded, a brow, or hand, or their clothing giving vivid evidence of the fact.

Although the general impression made by the whole of the wretched group was painful, one has among them one very interested me. It was that of a young man, not more than nineteen or twenty. His features were comely, and as I thought showing noble sentiments. Still, in his clear blue eye, was neither savage nor reckless, but seemed to express only great sorrow and astonishment, at being, from some sudden thought of home perhaps, it spoke or was confused with tears.

I followed the melancholy procession to the jail, thinking only of the young man. After the prisoners had been ushered into their new abode, a popular anti-tithe attorney, whom I knew, accosted me. He was always ready to conduct, gratis, the defence of any prisoner whose friends could and he told me his intention of going into the jail at once, to try and collect material for saving the lives, of at least, one of the unfortunate. I expressed a wish to assist him in this task. He readily consented, observing that as the unfortunate man would certainly be placed on their trial next day, no offer of aid in their favor was to be disregarded. We agreed to go together.

I felt in my lot to visit the cell of the boy who had so much interested me. His assertions seem to regret that I had not formed a strong opinion of his character; they better still, that there was a good chance of saving him from the gallows, even if he had to leave his native land for ever.

He had been formed, he said, to accompany the others on their fatal expedition, but he had never been "out" before, and he had not pulled a trigger or raised a hand against the police. His more guilty associates had engaged him, at last, to go, and contrive his statement. So, confident that the police would also bear him out as the really critical moment, I took notes of his defence for my friend the attorney, and passed on to other cells.

The magnetic attorney was right. By twelve o'clock next day, four of the men, including my favorite client, were placed at the bar. Three others were too ill of their wounds to be produced. All was soon over—and over, too, to my great affliction, and almost consternation.

Instead of swearing that the young man had been compelled by herdsmen during the battle outside the gentlemen's house, the police, one and all, distinctly deposed that his was the hand which slew one of their men, and that, perhaps fatally, wounded another constable.

In vain did he protest—with the energy of a young and ardent feeling for life and its array of happy promise—against their evidence. In vain did his fellow prisoners support him. He and they were found guilty in course.

But his fate was the awful one; of him the example was to be made. While the other men were to be transported for life, he was doomed to be hanged within forty-eight hours, and his body given over for dissection.

As the judge uttered in the last words of his sentence, I shrick—I shall never forget it—a woman's shriek rang through the court room, and then I heard a heavy fall. The young original had been carried out to side during his sentence. At the sound, stirring notes in his ear, rushed into upright and perfect energy. His hands, which had grasped the dock, were clasped together; the blood mounted to his face; his tips parted, and he shouted:

"Hoya! It is not I knew she'd be here!"

He suddenly made a spring to clear the back part of the dock. Obviously, no impulse to escape dictated the action. He wanted to raise Hoya—his beloved Hoya—from the floor of the court room, and clasp her in his arms. This was all. And doubtless, in his vigorous and thrice-nerved strength, he must have succeeded in his wild attempt, but that the sleeve of one arm, and the hand of the other became impaled on the sharp iron spikes which environed the formidable barrier before him. Thus arrested, he was easily secured, and instantly led out through a drap door in the bottom of the dock, to his "condemned cell," continuing till his voice was lost in the depths beneath, to call out:

"Hoya! Cushlamachree! Hoya!"

I hastened, with many others, into the body of the court, and there saw the poor girl, her father and mother, and other friends the connection between her dad the condemned boy.

They were to have been married at Easter. This did not lessen my interest in him. The attorney joined me. We hated every plan to obtain a commutation of his sentence, after Hoya's parents had forced her out of the court-house, rejecting all her entreaties to be led into the jail and—married.

We thought of hearing what the wounded policeman might say. But he was fourteen miles distant, where the affray had occurred. Even though his evidence might be favorable, we knew we must be prepared to forward it to Dublin, as the judge would leave Kilkenny that day. We set to work, however, measuring two good horses, with all in three hours, learned from the lips of the wounded man, that the Rockite who had fired at him was an elderly and ill-favored fellow.

It was our next business to convey our new evidence into the town. We did so, in a carriage belonging to a gentleman whose house had been attacked. He was confronted with all the prisoners. We cautioned him to say nothing that would give a false hope to the object of our interest; but, after leaving the cell, he persisted in exculpating him from having either killed his comrade or attempting himself, and even, pointed out the real culprit amongst those who had not yet been brought to the dock.

This was a good beginning. An affidavit was soon prepared, which the policeman signed. A few minutes afterward, the attorney started for Dublin as fast as four horses could carry him. In 36 hours out of the forty eight allowed the condemned to prepare for death, had already elapsed. Our good attorney must now do his best to avoid within thirty-seven hours.

It was fearful not to have an hour to spare—to calculate time when it would just be stopping into eternity. But we had good hopes. If the horses did not fail on the road, and the judge and after him, the Lord Lieutenant, could be interviewed at once, it could be done.

I scarcely slept that night. Next morning early I called on the clergyman whose duty it was to attend the jail in hall of condemned cell. He and I had been schoolfellows. He was a young man of most amiable character. He told me his "poor parishioner" was not safe to die, nor did he dread the fate before him, notwithstanding his utter anguish of heart at so terrible a parting from his young sweetheart.

I told him the hopes we had, and asked the clergyman's opinion as to the propriety of alleviating the lad's agony by a hint of pardon. The priest would not hear of it, saying, this was his duty, he said, to allow nothing to distract the mind and heart of his penitent from resignation to his lot; and should he give him a hope of life, and then not that hope dashed, he would have helped to kill a human soul, not to save one. I gave up the point and tried to seek some consolation that would not prove a stinging sword from the one subject which absorbed and fevered them.

It rain! When night came, I had less sleep than on the first night of the arrests.

[illegible] to meet, even so early, our anxious attorney coming back to us with a white handkerchief, streaming from the window of the postchaise. That idea got into my head, and recurred every moment. I did not meet him. I hastened to the jail.

The town clock struck twelve. The boy had but an hour to live. I looked toward the cell, whither he had been removed for execution. The black flag was waving over it! I ran as fast as I could toward the jail. Arrived at the iron gate of its outer yard, I was scarce conscious of having passed that act on a height confronting it, of sound and shriek, of the clergyman and soldiers at the gate, till one of them refused me way.

I urged the sergeant to convey my name to the governor of the prison, and was soon admitted. I saw the governor and sheriff, and told them our case. Their eyes brightened. The sheriff put back his watch three-quarters of an hour, and said he would wait it was right, and all the clocks in town were wrong, even if they should bang him for his mission.

One o'clock soon struck. The governor rode and agitated, made a rational signal to the sheriff. We hastened to see the man, and he was shown the infallible watch, and ordered within without a word. The silence was only broken by most appalling sobs; you could see the man of stay of a step and under the window of the condemned cell; another by the screaming of the poor damned and the priest, both growing more fervent in prayer since the clock struck one.

The minutes flew. I felt a shaking pain in my throat. It was hurling with thirst. I felt my presence of mind. The great suspense again. I remained alone, confused and agonized. In a few moments the sheriff came out, confused, and with tears on his cheeks. The clergyman and his pupil followed. The priest had passed an arm through one of the manacled arms of the prisoner, at his side, and kept contravene his statement. So, confident that the police would also bear him out at the really critical moment, I took notes of his defence for my friend the attorney, and passed on to other cells.

The young original had been carried out to side during his sentence. At the sound, stirring notes in his ear, rushed into upright and perfect energy. His hands, which had grasped the dock, were clasped together; the blood mounted to his face; his tips parted, and he shouted:

"Hoya! It is not I knew she'd be here!"

He suddenly made a spring to clear the back part of the dock. Obviously, no impulse to escape dictated the action. He

MARK TWAIN.

The Diversified Career of a Man who was a Born Humorist.

Mark Twain has a big head stuck on by a large neck to a pair of round shoulders. Recently he came on to the stage at Washington, and, though he were half asleep, and he looked to me as though nature, in putting him together, had, somehow, got the joints mixed. He has a big face, a face large enough to represent any kind of genius, and eyes large, black and deep. He has a thick, bushy mustache which overhangs his characteristic mouth. As he stood on the stage he reminded me much of a wooden cigar store Indian, and as he revolved out his words with scarcely a gesture his voice made me think of a little brass saw slowly grinding inside a corpse. He did not laugh while he uttered his funniest jokes, and when the audience roared he merely stood and his chin or pulled his mustache. Still he spoke not only being satisfied, and I do not doubt the contrast of his first days in Washington, when he came here years ago and had hard work making money enough to pay his board bills from fortnight to him. Though it is not generally known, Mark Twain was

ONCE A WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENT.

He came here from the West with Senator Stuart, and for a time wrote letters to the Alta California and the New York Tribune. He used to drink a good deal in those days, and was hardly considered a reputable character. It was shortly before this that he made that trip from which he returned as "Innocents Abroad," and this book he wrote here from the notes he took during his tour. The book made him both famous and wealthy. His manuscript he first sent to many prominent publishers, but they all rejected it, and he was about giving it up in despair when a Hartford company took hold of it. The result was they made $70,000 of the book and sold more than 200,000 copies of it. It was after this that Mark Twain went to Europe and lived a year. A man who worked on the paper at the time he left for Europe said he thought it was not a success. He loafed around the office, giving the office boy and telling jokes and stories rather than writing, and the only fruit of his Buffalo experience was the marriage, which, like "Innocents Abroad," turned out well. His wife brought a pot of gold into the family, and when he got to Elmira he found that his father-in-law had made him and thrown in a coachman with a hug on his back. Twain did not remain in Elmira, however, but went to Hartford and began to write "Roughing it." The work also successful, and established his fame. Mark Twain probably makes as much out of his books as any other writer in the country. He has his Hartford firm publish his books for him, and he always argues it that he gets a royalty on those printed in Europe. He is better known in foreign lands than any other American writer, and he is an international character. He has got his money out of his from real life, and his descriptions of travel are in the main true. He is a hard worker, and while at Hartford he writes in his billiard room in the attic. Like Trollope, he always has a watch before him, and the chambermaid knows that on the seat of one's chair there is a good literary work, and, like Blaine, he has a fixed amount of writing for each day's work. He rewrites many of his chapters, and some of them have been published and interlined again and again. Mr. Clemens—every one knows Mark Twain's name is Clemens—will be 40 years old on the 30th of this month. He is quite stout, and, if he has taken care of himself ever since he was 15. He has been a practical printer, a steamboat pilot, a miner, a newspaper writer, a singer, a reporter, a lecturer and a book-maker.

THE PRESENT OF A BROWN STONE FRONT,

FIRE-PROOF INDIANS.

How the Hawthorn Dance is Performed at the Navajo Agency.

Mr. John Sweet, who has recently been travelling in New Mexico and Arizona, gives an interesting and graphic sketch to a Denver Tribune correspondent of the "Hawthorn Dance," which he had witnessed at one of the Navajo agencies. It took place in a circular form about forty paces in diameter. In the centre, about eight feet high, was constructed of fresh juniper and pinon boughs. In the centre, was a conical pile of wood, about twelve feet high, which was to make the great central fire. Around this, a ring fast from the fence, a dozen smaller fires were burning for the comfort and convenience of the spectators, who numbered 500 men, women, and children, gathered here from various parts of this Navajo country.

The fire-dance was the most picturesque and startling of all. Some time before the dancers entered I heard strange sounds mingled with the blowing of the buffalo horn. The sounds were much like the call of the sandhill crane and, perhaps, the properly called "trumpeting," and they were made by the dancers concealed behind the exercises. The noises continued to grow louder and more insane, until we heard them at the opening in the east, and a moment after we saw the dancers clothing on than a breech-clout entered. Every man bore a long, thick bundle of polished cedar bark in each hand, except the leader, who carried four smaller fagots of the same material. Four times they paraded around the fire, waving their bundles of bark towards the flame (from they baited in the east; the leader advanced to the east, and, with a bow, he cast one of his fagots, and, trumpeting loudly, threw it upon the fire; the other three then, in succession, performed a singular act at the south, the west, and the north, but before the north-west, he brandished his bark in it with the fagots of his comrades. As each of the fagots was cast upon the fire, some of the spectators blew into their hands and rubbed their faces as if they were cold, and after the flame.

When the fagots were in the whole band began a wild dance around the fire. At first they kept close together and spat upon one another some substance of supposed medicinal virtue. Soon they scattered and ran, apparently without concert, the rapid racing among the brands to throw out long, brilliant streamers of flame over the naked hands and arms of the dancers. They then commenced to apply the brands to their naked bodies and the bodies of their companions in front of them—no man once turning his back. At times the dancers cruel to the victim vigorous blows with his flaming stick, and, when he stood, as at times, it was a sponge, and, creeping close to the victim, sponge his face and body with water for several moments, as if he were bathing him in the waters from which he had just taken up with some one in front of him, and, in turn, bathe him in flames. At times, when a dancer found a good one in front of him, he proceeded to spouse his own back, and might see the big white sparks fly over three circuits around the fire, or until he overtook some one else. At each spot in the circuit of the blaze the loud trumpeting was heard and it often seemed as if a dozen hundred cranes were winging their way overhead, southward in the darkness. Ever and anon, the dancers would stop and, in the central fire, but when it was a fagot of cedar bark, it was lighted and used as a torch.

THE SONGS OF IRELAND.

Sweet, Plaintive and Tender, They Breath the Soul of the Nation.

There are few traits so characteristic of individual nations as their music, few which have so much to do with shaping a person and political career, and few of which the people of other nations so more proud.

Nor should we be surprised at this. The refined mind of the hard soldier fails to thrill to the spirit which pervades a national cry; and if it should, it is as least recreant, strange. I have heard many too scornful of the feelings and emotions of his countrymen, and, strange to say, generally the character which they have acquired, either by temperament or political circumstances. It is this ambodiment of the general features of every people that makes them so proud of and so much attached to their national music. Another cause, perhaps every bit as powerful, is the magic influence it has exerted over the tender hearts of their children.

Every one is aware of the brilliancy, softness, and exquisite sweetness of the Italian masters. Is not such the idiosyncracy of the nation? Who that has heard the popular airs of Germany, stately, romantic and martial, but is at once reminded of the pride of the feudal ages, who could dethrone an emperor or crowd in hundreds at the trumpet's call to fight against the Moslem? The sprightly and polished French—who is absolutely dancing mad—who, when idle, and what can be more stirring or spirited than some of his martial airs! We all know numerous examples of this kind, but these are quite sufficient to show how the music of a country influences its people and shapes character, and when applied to Irishmen, to show how it has stirred (neglected as it is) it has no other claim on their sympathies, but it is equal to the most powerful and pathetic condition of the nation.

Few adventures in life are more thrilling, pathos and plaintive melancholy tells him of the gloom that has for centuries overshadowed his native land, and, consequently, it is a somber tinge on the national mind. Again it has some of the martial spirit, and, the elastic spirit of the Milesian, that makes it so dear to the people, and instead of the sorrows that surround him, "And smile when a sunshine breaks through the cloud." And where is the daring energy, the high and impulsive courage, that had the "Irish battalions" to victory at Fontenoy, Cremona and Fontenoy, more admirably expressed than in these martial melodies, which make the blood in a boiling tide through the veins and ring on the ear like the sabre clash in battle.

Irish is our music. And yet there are Irishmen among whom the name of a native song—we do not overright paradox—the sing-song of a native air, is, they, begrudging almost the total want of a gentlemanly education, and, again he asserts that, and it is a sponge, and, creeping close to the victim, sponge his face and body with water for several moments, as if he were bathing him in the waters from which he had just taken up with some one in front of him, and, in turn, bathe him in flames. At times, when a dancer found a good one in front of him, he proceeded to spouse his own back, and might see the big white sparks fly over three circuits around the fire, or until he overtook some one else. At each spot in the circuit of the blaze the loud trumpeting was heard and it often seemed as if a dozen hundred cranes were winging their way overhead, southward in the darkness. Ever and anon, the dancers would stop and, in the central fire, but when it was a fagot of cedar bark, it was lighted and used as a torch.

AFRICAN CANNIBALS.

Peculiarities of the Man-eaters of the Dark Continent.

Any white man who visits the few tribes in Africa that eat human flesh is likely to have a laughable reception, and is certain to find himself among natives who, in their intelligence, arts, and personal and moral qualities are not equalled by any other native tribes. This fact, indeed, is true of man-eaters the world over, notwithstanding the popular impression that cannibalism characterizes only the lowest savages. Perhaps it was due to the Cannibal Isles, where the cannibal Cardinos filled the natives of Hayti with great terror. The word cannibal signifies a brave or valiant man, and is derived from the name by which the Carribees called themselves. A few hundred miles south west of Lake Albert Nyanza, on the banks of the Congo, there is a great tribe whose cannibalism is the most pronounced of any of the natives of Africa. They are the Mobuttus, a red-skinned race, physically fine specimens of manhood, and far superior to the black tribes around them in arts of war and peace. They inhabit a beautiful fertile country, thickly populated, dotted with rolling downs. They engage in agriculture, and, though they are frequent, is not a regular article of food except among the wealthier families. Strangers, who have lived among them for several months, say they are not, like many African tribes, children of paradise. They are human and their processes of thought, but that they understood reason and possessed a good deal of practical science. The specimens of their pottery, which are the celebrated Museum of Berlin, are equal to equal the best work of Egyptian art. They are ingenious wood-carvers, and the greatest boatmen on the Congo. Their roofed building described by Schweinfurth, built of timber, was 150 feet long, 50 feet wide and 50 feet high and held an audience of nearly 1,000 persons.

It is a common idea of cannibal tribes to conceal their practices as much as possible from the knowledge of others. Neither Schweinfurth, Junker nor Casati had seen the Mobuttus in any process of butchering or eating human flesh. During his months of residence among them, Schweinfurth on just two occasions saw women of the tribe preparing human flesh for consumption. The cooks were women, who were boiling sundry arms and legs, but his presence was unexpected and unwelcome, and he was invited to go elsewhere. In conversation, however, the Mobuttus made no secret of their practices, of which, indeed, there were numerous evidences in the shape of carefully picked human bones that were scattered about all their settlements. They returns are the specimens of human skulls, which are almost incessantly waging with one another. The tribes about Lake Albert are wisely seeking how they can secure their supply of human victims. The both political parties profess at present to be anxious to secure Irish immigrants, but, exacting new laws which will give the country a system of compulsory public compensation the landlords, and by those who make the Irish people the basis of self government. The Irish people are not a race to be a vant for the three fiend of discontent, lest the whole world should be ruined, and their rise and sweep over the land a devastating and lawless inundation.

The men of both parties who are sincerely desirous to do justice to Ireland, and to secure to her the blessings of self government, are all sensible of the fact that it is a delicate and difficult subject, and, if it should, it is as least recognized, and, if it should, it is as least recognized, and, if it should, it is as least recognized

THE MONITOR.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY. PAPER OF THE ARCHDIOCESE.

Is MONITOR was the largest circulation of any Religious Paper published on the Pacific Coast.

WEDNESDAY AUGUST 26, 1885.

MISSION OF THE CATHOLIC PRESS.

"Journalism is the greatest social power, because it is also the most diffusive, penetrating, and, when organized (alas, too seldom!) the most efficacious agency in the world. In our view, religious journalism is not only entitled to be classed among the agencies of God, but is responsible for our welfare of which we are a part in eternal interests. What is and what ought to be the subject of Catholic journalism but to combine and direct all these agencies, from Sunday School up to Ecumenical Council, from Young Men's Association up to Mass Meeting, from Mass Meeting up to Mass Convention, from Mass Convention up to Plenary Council, from Plenary Council up to Vatican Council, under whose protection they wait to be placed, the writers of Catholic journals who defend the cause of religion, the rights and throne of the Holy Father, and the rights, duties, consolations and powers of the laities and Society.—Pop. Ed.

Editorial Notes.

—A curious calculator has discovered that, out of every 50,000 females in England, 6,816 answer to the name of Mary, and out of the same number of males 6,500 are named William.

—The London Telegraph is good enough to call the Fourth of July "as much an English as an American holiday." That's a fact, says the Boston Pilot, England was as necessary a feature of the original Fourth, as the Dutch was of original sin.

—A paper pane has been manufactured at Paris. The material for the case was compressed and took a perfect polish, and the tone of the instrument, though not loud, was very sweet—a soft, full, quasi-continuous sound, resembling somewhat that of the organ.

—A subscriber in Watsonville has sent us an envelope full of fly-leaves—or "lies leaves" perhaps it would be better to call them. They are issued by the American Tract Society, and when so filled with nonsensical "gush," they contain a fountain of fanatical fury against the Catholic Church. We will answer some peculiar questions propounded in "Tract No. 207," next week (D. v.) and show up the shallowness of sectarian objections to the Catholic Church.

—The Propaganda has recognized the value of the Catholic press by sending a circular to the heads of Foreign missions which contains instructions for a more regular system of correspondence and communication between them and the Sacred Congregation. Among other instructions is one requesting that journals, magazine, and other periodicals appearing in these missions, especially those containing information relative to their local work, should be sent to the Propaganda Archives.

—The so-called "enterprise" of the daily press has broken out in a new avenue. The last style of reporting includes all the blasphemous oaths in the use of the name of God uttered by crazy coroners and other cranks, which are printed in full for the use and benefit of the rising generation who then learn to swear according to the most fashionable style of blasphemy, by regularly perusing the daily paper! And yet people wonder why it is that the criminal court of America are such incorrigible infidels who have a God to swear by but not to serve.

—It is said that of the 100 suspects who were in Kilmainham Jail, Dublin, with Mr. Parnell three years ago, 5 have been hanged, 7 are dead, 10 have been sent to penal servitude for life, and 30 are car conductors and drivers in New York, Brooklyn and Chicago. All of them had good businesses or professions, but had to leave Ireland in consequence of the severity of the Crimes Act. These calling are all animated with the spirit of true patriotism. They see the dawn of Irish freedom, and we pray they may live to enjoy its sunshine.

—Patrons of Catholic newspapers should remember that they are one of the thousands who are derelict in their duty in remitting their subscriptions promptly. Think for a moment that printers are human; that they expect to get paid once a week; that paper bills, rent, gas and water bills have to be paid monthly; that Uncle Sam will not deliver the Monitor in your house on the credit system; he has no regard for person or position in this case; think if all subscribers are derelict as I am, how can this thing continue. A little attention to these things and we are sure there will be few delinquent subscribers on our books.

—Limerick has won the day. Lord Carnarvon, the new Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, has withdrawn Spencer's proclamation against the city of the violated treaty, which had been issued because of its refusal to pay the extra tax assessed against it on account of extra police employed to suppress the liberties of the citizens. The municipal council stoutly refused to pay the tax and defied the Government to enforce its collection. The administration has bowed to their defiance and has now requested an animal interview to settle the dispute. Score another victory for the city of the Violated Treaty.

—Changes in the composition of the Sacred College come rapidly. Already the Cardinals created by the present Pontiff outnumber those created by Pope Pius IX. Out of the present total of sixty two Cardinals, twenty-eight were their election to Pope Pius and thirty-four to Pope Leo. The Religious Orders have now thirteen representatives, who are thus described:—5 Benedictines, 1 Augustinian, 2 Oratorians, 1 Oblate of Mary, 1 Jesuit, 1 Capuchin, and 2 Dominicans. Considered in relation to nationality, the Sacred College is thus divided:—30 Italians, 5 French, 3 English, 3 Irish, 3 Austrians, 2 Hungarians, 4 Austrians 4 Spaniards, 2 Portugese, and 2 Poles. Forty-two Cardinals have died during the reign of the present Holy Father.

—The disgraceful manner in which the Baltimore Mirror yelps like a blood-hound at Minister Kelley is a blot upon the Catholic character of that veteran journal. The fact that Archbishop Gibbons, Bishop Keane of Richmond—and many others among the most eminent Prelates of America—endorse Mr. Kelley, should at least suggest to any Catholic editor the impropriety of his conduct in persistently condemning a Catholic gentleman whom authorities of the Church have delighted to honor.

—We had prepared a very caustic article against the members of the Congregational Club for their conduct relative to the invitation their pastor extended to Mr. Sam Cupel to lecture before them, as reported in the daily papers, but we have since learned from a member in whom we have very confidence, that much of the report in the daily press was entirely fictitious, hence, as we have no desire to wound the feelings of any fellow-creature upon information so unreliable, we abstain altogether from making any comments upon the Club in question.

—On Saturday morning the 1st inst., at the Palace of the Cancellera, Cardinal Martel, Vice-Chancellor of Holy Church, conferred the sacred pallium on the Archbishop-elect of Dublin, and on the procurators of proxies of the new Archbishops of Cologne, Prague, Oregon, S. Domingo, Bucharest, and Santa Fe. On the next day in the church of the Irish College, "Saint Agata in Suburra, Cardinal Moran gave episcopal consecration to the new Archbishop of Dublin, as well as to Mgr. Gravel, the Bishop of the new See of Nicolet, in Canada, and to Mgr. Sogaro, appointed Vice-Gerent for Central Africa. The assistant Bishops were the Bishop of Clogher (Dr. Donnelly) and Mgr. Kirby, titular Bishop of Lisa and Rector of the Irish College. There was a numerous attendance.

Is This Thus?

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR:—

Dear Sir—The Boston Christian Register says: "The Protestants at the close of this 19th century numbered 40,000,000, while the Roman Catholics numbered 120,000,000. In 1834 the Protestants numbered 100,000,000 and the Catholics 184,000,000. Protestants have increased about 300 per cent, and the Catholic increased per cent." Are these figures correct? I do know where to find out, but I suspect the showing is not so bad for Catholics as the statement would make it appear. It was remarked, you may remember, in regard to a certain battle between men and lions, in which the latter were represented as badly beaten, that if the lions had written the account it would read very differently. It is just possible that this Protestant Register has relied for its statistics on the Pope's Year Book. VERAX.

"VERAX" is right. Put not your faith in sectarian statistics as they are purposely concocted by Protestant preachers in order to create a fictitious "boom" for their different decaying sects. The sole aim of sectarianism is to make "a good showing before the world," and in order to do this writers will invoke the aid of the Infernal Father of Lies if his counsel is necessary for the greater development of their diabolical efforts to prove that "Popery" is as dead as a double-clinched door nail: it has come to be a common maxim among many Protestant writers that it is as sin to falsify figures or to alter statistics in order "to make Rome howl," and the Protestant paper quoted by "VERAX" was only fulfilling its fiendish mission when it thus wilfully misrepresented the truth by publishing figures that have no substantial existence. It matters not to the Church of God whether her children number twelve individuals or twelve hundred thousand million souls. She was the one holy Catholic and Apostolic Church when she could not call a thousand communicants to her communal feast, and she will continue to be the true Church of Christ even though ninety-nine hundredths of the foolish people of the world were to revert back to paganism. Protestantism as a religion is "a dead duck," and its preachers at this period of the world's existence are merely "whistling in order to keep their courage up." They call millions of people "Protestants" who care far less for Luther, Wesley or any of the other creed-makers, than Lucifer does, and thus they try to "throw dust into the eyes of the world." "By their fruits ye shall know them," and when any reflecting Christian looks around at the "fruits" of Protestantism, it will not take him long to discover the fact that a system of sectarianism founded on error can never arrive at God's truth. Hence when preachers problem that Protestantism is the topsawyer in the religious world they merely imitate Ananias and astonish nobody who knows with what facility they can falsify.

Card from Colonel Tobin.

The malignant crank who controls a certain disreputable anti Catholic publication in this city, having twisted his hatred of all things holy upon the head of Colonel Tobin for permitting the celebration of Mass on the ground of the military encampment at Santa Cruz, the commander of the Third Regiment answers the ruffianly assault of the bigoted blackguard who assails him in the following card which fully convices the aforesaid crank of his customary habit of resorting to falsehood in order to vent his spleen against American citizens merely because they profess the Catholic faith:—

SAN FRANCISCO, August 24, 1885.

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR:

Dear Sir—My attention has just been called to an article published in a weekly paper of this city containing a letter to myself upon my religious belief and an attack upon my character because I stated that an order issued by me was issued at Camp Sheridan on Sunday, August 16, for the celebrity of my creation, and alleging that I ordered the presence of the regiment, that organization is a Catholic institution, and that I am a patriotism, and almost entirely so by birth. It contains it he makes a large number of assertions which are false, and I believe, therefore I have never sought to know, Catholic. I have never in my life, the latter Mass was celebrated upon a field which no one was ordered, but all were invited, religious service for the benefit of Protestants generally were held by a Protestant clergyman at the quarters of the Fourth Regiment, which, I frequently, have assisted on occasions. In justice to my regiment and to myself I ask publication of this communication. I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT TOBIN,
Colonel Third Infantry.

"Thou Shalt Not Bear False Witness Against Thy Neighbor."

This is one of the Commandments set forth in the Decalogue by Almighty God thousands of years ago, and so important was it considered by inspired Wisdom Itself, that the Creator of mankind did not wait even for the introduction of Christianity into the world in order to promulgate it, but the God of Justice placed it in His omnipotent Wisdom—among the Ten Commandments given to Moses for the moral and spiritual guidance of the children of Israel. It is not strange to say, that there is no mistake of the Most High God purely in order to prejudice what these Protestants, in their treatment of Catholic affairs, and especially when they undertake to revile the character of their Catholic brethren upon any question concerning crimes to which all human flesh may be heir, but wherein the charges brought against Catholics are generally brought forth as fabulous statements made purposely in order to prejudice what these Commandment-breakers call "the Roman Church," before the eyes of the whole world.

We had a sample of this species of scandalous wickedness of God's law in the Pacific last week, wherein a slander-hatching heretic, under the signature of "H," undertakes to break the Ten Commandments wilfully and maliciously by "bearing false witness" against his Catholic neighbor, by the fabrication of calumnious charges which have—even on their very face—no foundation in truth whatever to fact. Does the Decalogue—thus giving detractor imagine that Almighty God will not hold him to account for this malignant assault upon one of the commands given by the God of Justice! Do the editors of the Pacific imagine that Almighty God will hold them guiltless in this transgression of His law! Assuredly not! Unless all these practical transgressors repent and make proper restitution, they will never be permitted to see the face of God or to bask in the sunshine of heavenly glory!

If is not the MONITOR that thus decides the eternal fate of these men, but it is the test of God's Truth as set forth in the Bible, which so many Protestants pretend to love and live by, but whom divine precepts they prostitute to their own bitter bigotry whenever they desire to gratify their hatred towards the Catholic Church.

The foolish fanatic who flaunts the banner of Infidelity through the columns of the Pacific, undertakes to "bear false witness against his neighbor" by alleging that Catholics form the largest percentage of the criminal classes in England, Ireland, Canada, Prussia, Italy, Spain and South America. This is a very grave charge, yet it is made upon the ipse dixit of a disguised bigot whose so-called statistics are without a reason, and whose figures are manifest forgeries.

The bigot who thus breaks every Commandment in the Decalogue by his detraction, was incensed against the MONITOR for having published the statements of Irish judges and English prosecuting attorneys in proof of the peaceable condition of that portion of Ireland, as substantiated by the testimony of the chief judges of Ireland, wherein Catholic people in all lands, into the commission of venial offences against the law. Hal, like the penitent thief on the cross, they at least atone for their misdeeds by sorrow for their sins, and make their peace with Almighty God. But what shall we say of those purse-proud pe-digree Protestants whose sins are so enormous, and whose crimes are hateful even in the sight of merciful heaven, yet who stand in the middle of their nonsectarian congregations, twirling harlots, and gloat in their gilded cover their superiority to that unfortunate fallen sinner who was forced by stress of nature to steal a loaf of bread in order to save his life!

God judges men justly. Man's judgment is warped by the false theories engendered in his mind by Protestant error. Hence there may be a hundred venial sins committed by a hundred Catholics, and their aggregate enormity may not be as great in the sight of Almighty God on the day of Judgment as a single mortal sin committed by a single Protestant who has the barrier of wealth against the temptation of poverty, and who has erected here all the defences against transgressing God's law which are not to be found among the hundred Catholic sinners.

For these reasons, therefore, statistics of crime—unless we are familiar with the circumstances of the parties—are useless when applied to Catholics, or when subject used to bolster up "the bastard" influence of Christianity upon the human character. The Church is God's creation, and it will be for ever: His laws are her guide for all her children; and where God is there virtue, purity, and peace are to be found. But when Catholics violate God's laws they often do so unwittingly, or by force of circumstances which palliate their offence before the Judge of the living and the dead; and when such hate-filled fanatics as "H" undertake to castigate their Catholic brethren, they should remember that God's good advice them to "Judge not lest you be judged."

Whenever Protestant writers undertake to criticise their Catholic neighbors they seem to imagine that by parading Catholic shortcomings they elevate Protestant error and purify Protestant vice. In this respect such writers writers become the modern representatives of that creed of scarlet Pharisees and Publicans who surrounded the sinful Mary Magdalen when she fled for refuge to the feet of Our Blessed Redeemer; and when "H," and others of his calumniating caliber, attempt to cast stones upon the Church of God, we can truly say to them in the language of that Divine Saviour who came from heaven in order to save sinners: "Let him who is without sin first cast a stone at me."

Our Protestant critics seem also to forget—in the rage of their rancor against our only religion—that some of the greatest sinners have been transformed by the power of God into the greatest saints, hence the fact that Catholics sin against the laws of God or of any land, need not necessarily debar them from the friendship of God. St. Paul was so great a sinner that even a voice from Heaven appealed to him to know why —Cardinal Manning, who is one of the best authorities on the social and religious questions of the day, says that the unity of the Catholic Church, throughout the world, was never more marked than now, while other religions are continually splitting up. Speaking of the condition of religion in England, His Eminence said that several teachers whittled away the outlines of the truths they undertook to teach. Moral and religious ideas, confined to the tender mercies of "private judgments," got to be exceedingly hard to resist the whitling process, especially when the sense of consciousness back of the private judgments.

—The new Church of the Jesuits at Braque, Belgium, was consecrated and opened last month. It is a substantial edifice of brick and stone, in the Early Pointed style, erected from designs by M. Pepin, and built under the supervision of the Rev. Father Van Darker, S. J., who is well known as an English confessor to many of our Catholic fellow-countrymen who have sojourned in Belgium. Cardinal Manning, who is one of the best authorities on the social and religious questions of the day, says that the unity of the Catholic Church, throughout the world, was never more marked than now, while other religions are continually splitting up. Speaking of the condition of religion in England, His Eminence said that several teachers whittled away the outlines of the truths they undertook to teach. Moral and religious ideas, confined to the tender mercies of "private judgments," got to be exceedingly hard to resist the whitling process, especially when the sense of consciousness back of the private judgments.

ALLOCUTION

Of Our Most Holy Lord Leo XIII., by Divine Providence Pope

TRANSLATED FROM THE ORIGINAL LATIN BY THE DAILY MONITOR.

Venerable Brothers—Health and Benediction—Which We addressed you in this sacred place, we made a confession which, if it does not have the occasion of real sorrow to Us, now can be a cause of great joy to you, and of a great honor. Indeed, We said among these, as you are aware, in this place, the Sacred Pontiff, Pius, Our predecessor, of most pious memory, was wont to address the Sacred Consistory, which, in fact, We now do, and We, Venerable Brothers, Our Predecessor, Pius, Pontiff Pius, Pontiff Pius, Pontiff

HOUSE CLEANING.

A Prize Essay on How to do it.

The Philadelphia Weekly Press recently offered a prize for the best essay on House Cleaning. The following, by Charlotte Hall, was successful:

One of the difficulties of home cleaning is in finding the right place to begin. Start with the sun. Let them understand that women do not clean house for their own amusement, but because it is an important work which must be performed, and which will be finished with as little delay and annoyance to others as possible. By preserving an even temper we can spare the tempers of those about us. Have a perfect understanding that the work is not to be subject to whims or indigestion, or made the occasion of selfish complainings, and then push ahead quietly, quickly and thoroughly to the end.

Every spring and fall overhaul all old clothing, empty the rag-bags and dispose of the contents and all other rubbish. In the spring peak away all heavy clothing. Wrap such articles separately with camphor in old newspapers to protect the clothing from moths. In the fall have the summer clothing washed and put away without starching, as starch sets the clothes and turns white goods yellow.

Beginning with the upper story, take each room separately, that the whole house may not be in confusion at the same time. Then in case of sudden illness or unforeseen interruption some of the rooms will be habitable. Remove all pictures and fancy articles, carefully brush and wipe them free from dust, and with a soft, damp cloth, polish such article that will not be injured by an application of water. Then sover and put them away until the room is cleaned. This plan of cleaning as thoroughly as possible all articles before removing them from the room, avoids unnecessary going and from one place to another. The next thing is to take all the clothing from the closets, bureaus and wardrobes cleaning each receptacle thoroughly. Remove all furniture possible from the room, wiping off the dust before doing so, and carefully covering what remains. Brush the bedding with a small whisk broom before taking it out of the room.

Next take up the carpet. A good plan is to have the tacks drawn from the room the day before, as it saves time after the cleaning is actually begun. If in the country have the carpets taken out of doors, well beaten, shaken, and swept on both sides. If in the city, the carpet cleaning houses do the work thoroughly and with little expense. Slightly sprinkle the bare floor with water and swept twice. With a large, clean, soft cloth wipe the dust from the walls and ceiling. Have a bucket of warm water slightly soapy, and with a clean, soft scrubbing brush go over the paint carefully. Do not let any water touch the wall paper. Wipe the paint dry with a soft cloth to give it an even polish. Soap used directly on paint makes it yellow or takes it off. With clean water and a soft cloth wash the window panes and polish dry with a chamois or a clean soft linen cloth. Old newspapers are excellent for this purpose. Have the floor well-scrubbed, and when it is perfectly dry have the carpets laid, and replace the things belonging to the room. Close the room doors and proceed with the next room, and so on until all the apartments on the upper story have been cleaned. Next clean the entries and stairways of that floor. It is better to leave the entry and stairway carpets until the whole house has been cleaned, when they can all be put down at once. Take the rooms entries and stairways of each floor successfully until the cellar is reached.

If your house is heated by a furnace have all the registers through the house closed were practicable, and then thoroughly sweep up the dust will accumulate in the cellar. The cellar should be well swept, washed, and lime scattered near the walls.

When the dining-room and kitchen are being cleaned, the pantries, dressers, and cupboards should be done first. All the kitchen utensils must be cleaned and polished, and the range blackened before anything else is done. If the work is being done in the country, where stoves are used instead of a furnace, clean out the stoves, blacken, cover and set them aside in some dry place until the fall cleaning is finished or until the fires are again needed, when they will be ready to put in their proper places.

Eating Lemons.

A good deal has been said through the press about the healthfulness of lemons. The latest advice is how to use them so that they will do the most good, as follows: Most people know the benefits of lemonade before breakfast, but few know that it is more than doubled by taking another at night also. The way to get the better of the bilious system without the blue pills or quinine is to take the juice of one, two or three lemons, according to excess, in as much ice water as makes it pleasant to drink without sugar before going to bed. In the morning, on rising, at least half an hour before breakfast, take the juice of one lemon in a goblet of water. This will clear the system of humors and bile with efficiency, without any of the weakening effects of calomel or Congress water. People should not irritate the stomach by eating lemons clear; the powerful acid of the juice, which is always not corrosive, invariably produces inflammation after a while, but, properly diluted, so that it does not burn or draw the throat, it does its medical work without harm, and, when the stomach is clear of food, has abundant opportunity to work over the system thoroughly, says a medical authority.

The Thompsonian Cancer Cure.

Dr. Samuel Thompson, the founder of the Thompsonian school, grandfather of the modern eclectic, botanic, and physio-medical schools, describes in his book a method of treatment which may have something in it. It is to make an ointment in the following way: Fill a brass kettle hanging full of the blossoms of red clover, add a little water, place over a fire and let it boil for some time; remove the heads of the clover by straining, and evaporate the liquid carefully to a solid extract. With this material he directs a plaister to be made, which acts as a caustic to the growth to which it is applied; the patient is to drink freely of a tea made from the red clover blossoms. He claims to have cured many cases of cancer in this way. No recent mention of this cancer cure appears to have been made. It certainly should be tested again, as if the difference between tumors are more readily made out than forty or fifty years ago, when Thompson flourished.

Lying in Bed with the Head High.

It is often a question among persons who are not acquainted with the anatomy and physiology of man, whether lying with the head elevated, or even with the body, is most wholesome. Most, consulting their own ease on this point, argue in favor of that which they prefer. Now, although many delight in bolstering up their heads at night, and sleeping without injury, yet we believe it to be a dangerous habit. The vessels through which the blood passes from the head to the heart, are always loosened in their cavities when the head is resting in bed higher than the body; therefore in cases attended with fever, the head should be nearly on a level with the body; and people ought to accustom themselves to sleep thus to avoid danger.

Family Fun.

Not His Property.

"Will you be kind enough to take that gripsack off that seat?" said a countryman, who got on a train at Lolling.

"No, sir, I don't propose to do anything of the sort," replied the drummer, who was sitting on the other side of the seat.

"Do you say that you are going to let that gripsack stay right there?"

"I am, sir! I do."

"In case you don't move that gripsack shall be under the painful necessity of calling the conductor."

"You can call the conductor, the engineer, and the brakeman if you want to. Perhaps you had better stop at the next station and send a special to old Jay Gould himself about it."

"The conductor will put you off the train."

"I don't care if he does. I am not going to take that gripsack from the place where it is."

The indignant passenger went through the train, and soon returned with the conductor.

"So you refuse to remove that gripsack do you?" asked the conductor.

"I do."

Great sensation.

"Why do you persist in refusing to remove that gripsack?"

"Because it's not mine."

"Why didn't you say so at once?"

"Because nobody asked me."

Bonnet Verses Flour.

It is a question whether the flour barrel or the spring bonnet has "the call" in household discussions. Many old and inexperienced observers shake their money on the "St. B.," while to a casual onlooker the "F. B." would seem to be of greater importance. It was just after the sermon, and they were wending their way home in a soothed and peaceful frame of mind.

"Oh, Joh, dit you see that delightful new bonnet of Mrs. Arbutus! I think I was something like that."

"Like that!" exclaimed Mr. Shuttle. "That! why, it's the worst phantasy in reg roses I ever saw."

"Now, Joh, you know better. That bonnet is a complete symphony in harmonious tones, so effect that is perfectly bewitching, and I'll have one like it if I have to scrape the silver off the inside of the flour barrel for the next fool of bread."

Off in one Round.

"Do you think the cholera will reach here next summer, Mr. Blockby?" she murmured, as she brushed a microbe of dandruff off his shoulder where her head had lately rested.

"I don't know, I'm sure; doctors seem to think so."

"It's awful, ain't it?"

"Terrible!"

"A great many die with it?"

"So I've heard."

"Don't you feel alarmed?"

"Why should I?"

"I read somewhere the other day that married men seldom take it, where single gentlemen are almost sure to."

"Is that so?" said Mr. Boothby.

"Yes, and it is almost generally fatal."

"Horrible, ain't it?" said Boothby, with a shudder.

"I do so hope you won't get it, Mr. Boothby," she whispered, tears starting to her eyes."

He pepped.

How He Made the Boy "Set."

All the adult population of Cobbs Ville had assembled to witness the hanging of justice. He wanted candy, and he wanted to see the river, and he wanted to see the train, and he wanted more than anything else use of Detroit could procure a sunish free grain. His mother bashed him up to see what she could, and never time he slapped her face and kicked her shins, and got off without even a pinch. Up and by an old man who sat near her, and who first the boy had walked on several times, he begin to get nervous, and turning to his right-hand neighbor, said:

"Land sakes! Why I've got to git onter here or spunk that boy."

"He just aches for it!" growled the other.

"He does. He puts me in mind of my William. I've seen William when nothing on earth but a spanking would pat good natured into him.

"I say I will go!" shouted the boy at this moment.

"Please, Johnny, be good," entreated his mother.

"I won't!"

"Oh, do! See how they are all looking at us."

"I don't care if they are."

"With that he went up to the old man and made a kick, and then the curtain went up on the play. With one trial and a few notions he was seized, whirled over a pair of knees, and, before the first echoed smack of the spanking machine began its work, his entire body of seven was neatly wrapped and the ugly taken out of him inside of sixty seconds, the work was no more complete than in the same time.

"There!" said the speaker, as he opened the child and placed him on a seat, "you'll feel better—a heap better. Hated to do it, you know, but saw that you was bound to git hot. Boy your mother's prayer for interfering in her's? matters, but you set right that till the train was ready."

The boy "set," and such a calm and solid peace stole over the crowd that the yells of the backwater outdoors gave everybody a pain.

Feed Bows.

"Charles," said a sharp-voiced woman to her husband, "do you know that you and I were had a reunion in a railway car?"

"Never heard of it," replied Charles in a subdued tone.

"I thought you hadn't, but don't you remember that it was that pair of slippers I presented to you seven years ago last Christmas—the Christmas before we were married—that did to our union? You remember how nicely they fitted, don't you? Well, Charles, one day when we were going to a picnic you had your feet up on a seat, and when you wasn't looking I took your slippers. Put for that pair of slippers I don't believe we'd ever been married."

A young, unmarried man sitting near by immediately took his feet down from a seat.

Labor Statistics.

A building was in process of erection opposite a public building in Washington city. One of the clerks, who had been looking out of the window for some time, said to another clerk who was reading a newspaper:

"I have been watching the workmen over there, and he has not done a lick of work in all this time, I wonder what he gets paid for?"

Just about the same time the workman remarked to a fellow workman

"Just look at the Government clerk over there. He hasn't done anything except look out of the window for the last half hour. No wonder the country is going to the dogs."

CONFIRMATION IN VIRGINIA CITY.

VIRGINIA CITY, August 13, 1885.

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR:

Dear Sir—Perhaps a few remarks upon the IMPORTANT EVENT which took place in this our mountain Church on Sunday, the 9th inst., may be of interest to the numerous readers of your sensible journal.

The solemn memories consequent upon the impressive ceremony which our beloved Bishop Manogue performed in St. Mary's stately church last Sunday morning will long be treasured up like the treasure of my second mite, the hearts of a handful who were present at the hallowed service.

As the same sky so clear and beautiful in this Nevadian clime put aside her mantle of gloomy night, and the glorious rays of the morning's sun brilliantly streamed over the majestic Dome of Mt. Davidson, many an anxious heart throbbed in fond expectation beneath a pure and swelling bosom. For, oh! happy thought, was not the delicious nectar drawing up which was the hands of God's great High Priest, would, in due time, be poured into the cup of life? Yes, the Heavenly Father, who blessed the bridal feast of the Holy Ghost, with the shield in danger, and hope be a bright anchor. We not the moment already registered when those dear ones of Holy Church would have behind the rubble of world and worldly, and be enrolled in that heroic band whose memorable banner never knew defeat, though its spoils fade, free and unstilled, vared and still does wave, for eight and two thousand years. Yes, the moment had then come when the children of darkness of Christendom would be sentenced on them by their great spiritual father and pastor.

The young Virgins entered the church dressed in white, veiled and crowned with wreaths of smiling flowers over floating veils adorned their tresses, with hearts overflowing with holy thoughts, the Angelic scene excited. Over 70 of these dear young spouses of Christ, and 90 boys so fair charming, marched in procession from St. Mary's to the church which they entered in a manner which would do credit to some of older years, thus, in very fairly, place Lynch, and our devoted Bishop, who officiated in the ceremony, in

THE LAST WORDS OF SAINT BERNARD.

(When Saint Bernard was so his death bed, the Abbotsoop of Metz anxiously presented himself at Clairvaux, earnestly supplicating the holy Abbot's assistance in quelling an insurrection which had broken out in his city. The Abbot immediately set out, and died ere a month had elapsed. The contrast between the sudden and hopless the praise was prevalent in alike. The dying Abbot, gifting the Archbishop's distress, and ever anxious to promote peace, wrote to the Bishop of Metz, and, appealing to Heaven's mercy, succeeded in calming their fury, and putting an end to the sanguinary strife.

There was sound of mournful sighing,
There was bitter wailing now,
When the Saint so long lay dying
In his Abbey of Clairvaux.
Where his sickliest knell beside him,
Waiting sadly for the sight
Of the grave that soon would hide him
From their loving, longing sight.

While they lingered thus surrounding Holy Bernard's bed of death,
At the gate a knock resounding
Heard they all with hated breath.

Then the Lord Archbishop entered
With a swift and eager tread,
And to him, on whom were centered
All those tearful eyes, he spoke.

"Bernard! Bernard! rise and aid me!"
Then he cried in frantic tone,
"Mutinous Metz is in rebellion
"Like a demon's den hath grown.
"Stands proud, with stubborn pennant
"Wars in force and foolish strife.
"Peaceful is, and valleys pleasant
"Are with devastation rife.

"Chant the doleful funeral quell,
"Have alone, all-consoling balm!
"Chant dolent the boats of hell."

From his bed of anguish mental
Then the dying Saint arose,
Passed beyond the skeleton's portal,
Sought the Sovereign Worthy foes.

Like a spectre there before them,
Stood that dying Saint and spoke
Spell supernal resting o'er them,
Spell of peace to soothe the storm.

In the hush of midnight holy
Chase the mighty sobbing proud,
And with robed brethren lowly,
At his sacred feet they bowed.
All in sorrow bent and humbled,
Blessed that love-transfigured hand,
Which so long had fondly fondled
Kin of prince and starving hind.

Then, his life of work accomplished,
And its last sweet labor done,
To his rest the Saint ascended,
To his crown so gradually won.

From the bosom of bliss eternal,
Where the Saint had forward fledge
Hold he looked with pity yearned
On the world's drear, tempest plain.
Of thy mission's consolation,
Did the shrill tumult cease—
Or in sweet sound of desolation
Cast thy sacred spell of peace.

TWILIGHT.

How beautiful is the twilight hour,
How calm the soft shade and sky
When Nature lends her lovelier gifts
And the sweet hour draws nigh.

The clouds in fleecy grandeur roll,
Tinged with the golden hues,
While others, decked in red and gold,
Go forth to meet the night.

They form in queer fantastic shapes,
Some glide like fairy boats;
In one, which seems to soar to us,
Sweet angels stand 'mid floats.

It is not only in the sky
The mystic change is seen
For beneath the forest shades, the leaves
Put forth a softer green.

The murmuring brooklet is silver,
The mournfully sighing breeze
Of purple, lilac, crimson, gold,
That are made upon the leaf of blue.

Sudden the rippling of the brook,
The soft sigh of the breeze,
Of some distant wedding bell.

But it is not only Nature
Thus is charmed by twilight's power,
For man, the Parfitted Zoneus and
This calm and holy hour,

To raise their hearts to God,
And to melt their souls in prayer
So that they may rest, and find a home
For every earthly care.

And as, yet lingar, we the day
Has vanished from our sight,
The heart grows more and more at the mists
Draw down the shades of night

Then as the twilight fades away,
We see the moon has risen
And flooded with her silvery light
The starry vault of heaven.

The Rose of the Vatican.

A True Story.

One beautiful morning, in the year 1853, His Holiness Pius IX. was taking his customary walk through the garden of the Vatican. As he entered a shady alley he saw a boy apparently six years old, whose little basket were filled with flowers, evidently gathered from the pontifical borders. When he caught sight of the Holy Father, the little fellow hastily dropped his oxford, forces harvest on the shining gravel, and stood stiff, with downcast eyes and blushing face. The Pontiff smiled, and approaching the child said, in the kindest manner possible:

"My child, where did you get those pretty flowers?"

"Over there, Holy Father; I gathered them in your own garden."

"Well, why did you throw them down when you saw me?"

"Because mamma is over yonder, and she strictly forbids me to touch one of the flowers," stammered the child.

"So, my child, you disobeyed your good mother! That was wrong, very wrong indeed; but I know you are sorry, for I see the tears in your eyes; so I forgive you this time, but for her and myself. Would you like to shook some pretty flowers?"

"Oh yes, Holy Father, I would! I do love carnations and lilies!" and the boy quickly forgetting the pain.

"Well, my son, I will give you full permission to take them. But look at these handsome roses; would you not prefer one of them?"

"Oh, thank you, Holy Father! I should like to have that large, open white rose.

"Why the white rose in particular, my son?"

"My Mamma loves the Pope, and I would like to offer it to her in memory of you; she would keep it always.

"What a pure name!" inquired Pius IX., cutting a lovely white rose.

"Leonello, Holy Father."

The Pope asked the child several other questions, to which the latter replied with the candor of his age, then kissed him and gave him his benediction. A shade came over Leonello's countenance, and he timidly looked up to the kind Pontiff as if something else was needed. The meek petition was quickly understood by the mantly Vicar of Christ, who, like his Master, made him self humble with the lowly. "What is it, my son,—you want something else?"

"Holy Father, you blessed me, though I was spoiling your garden," replied the boy; then, in words that seemed to be inspired, he added, "perhaps you will bless my father too, although he fought against your soldiers."

"I bless him with my whole heart, my child."

"Then he is no longer an enemy of the Pope, if you bless him, is he?

"I pardon him, as I do all my rebellious children.

"Oh, how happy my dear mamma will be!" cried the child.

"Well now, Leonello, go to your excellent mother; try to be a very good boy; obey your parents in everything that is just and right, and be sure you never forget that the Pope gave you his paternal and priestly blessing."

The boy ran to his mother, and the Pope, followed by his chamberlains, continued his morning parade.

Years have rolled on, and we find ourselves in the month of November, 1867. Great revels had been held in Rome, for numerous army, made up of hired assassins, mercenaries, freebooters, adventurers, and cutthroats, had been defeated, and the hero of the Pontifical Zouaves and the French battalions. A few days after the battle of Mentana, Pius IX., gave a visit of charity to an ambulance, in which there were several Garibaldian wounded. As he passed through the wards, he stopped at the bedside of a young man dangerously wounded.

"He is a Garibaldian," said the ambulance, in an undertone; "he refuses all spiritual aid, although he will surely die.

"Poor young man!" murmured Pius IX., gazing silent in the wounded patient; then, having looked at him attentively, he exclaimed: "Leonello! it is Leonello!

The words startled, opened his eyes, and a deep blush suffused his agonized countenance.

"My son, do you not recognize me? do you not remember the white rose I gave you in the garden of the Vatican?"

"Ah! I can never forget it; it always haunts my memory," sent the dying Garibaldian, trying to cover his face with both hands; "then I was a happy child."

"True, and now you are unfortunate, suffering, and have been, written and graved, unseen for now and unknown.

Lo! Nature reigns in power supreme,
Her mantle of green is thrown around
Her rocky ribs, her sides and all and all
Then be cried in frantic tone,
"Madness! Madness! Madness!"
"Like a demon's den hath grown.
"Stands proud, with stubborn pennant
"Wars in force and foolish strife.
"Peaceful is, and valleys pleasant
"Are with devastation rife.

"Chant the doleful funeral quell,
"Have alone, all-consoling balm!
"Chant dolent the boats of hell."

From his bed of anguish mental
Then the dying Saint arose,
Passed beyond the skeleton's portal,
Sought the Sovereign Worthy foes.

Like a spectre there before them,
Stood that dying Saint and spoke
Spell supernal resting o'er them,
Spell of peace to soothe the storm.

In the hush of midnight holy
Chase the mighty sobbing proud,
And with robed brethren lowly,
At his sacred feet they bowed.
All in sorrow bent and humbled,
Blessed that love-transfigured hand,
Which so long had fondly fondled
Kin of prince and starving hind.

Then, his life of work accomplished,
And its last sweet labor done,
To his rest the Saint ascended,
To his crown so gradually won.

From the bosom of bliss eternal,
Where the Saint had forward fledge
Hold he looked with pity yearned
On the world's drear, tempest plain.
Of thy mission's consolation,
Did the shrill tumult cease—
Or in sweet sound of desolation
Cast thy sacred spell of peace.

TWILIGHT.

How beautiful is the twilight hour,
How calm the soft shade and sky
When Nature lends her lovelier gifts
And the sweet hour draws nigh.

The clouds in fleecy grandeur roll,
Tinged with the golden hues,
While others, decked in red and gold,
Go forth to meet the night.

They form in queer fantastic shapes,
Some glide like fairy boats;
In one, which seems to soar to us,
Sweet angels stand 'mid floats.

It is not only in the sky
The mystic change is seen
For beneath the forest shades, the leaves
Put forth a softer green.

The murmuring brooklet is silver,
The mournfully sighing breeze
Of purple, lilac, crimson, gold,
That are made upon the leaf of blue.

Sudden the rippling of the brook,
The soft sigh of the breeze,
Of some distant wedding bell.

But it is not only Nature
Thus is charmed by twilight's power,
For man, the Parfitted Zoneus and
This calm and holy hour,

To raise their hearts to God,
And to melt their souls in prayer
So that they may rest, and find a home
For every earthly care.

And as, yet lingar, we the day
Has vanished from our sight,
The heart grows more and more at the mists
Draw down the shades of night

Then as the twilight fades away,
We see the moon has risen
And flooded with her silvery light
The starry vault of heaven.

PEOPLE WHO BUY PETS.

They Have Many Peculiar Fancies—A Monkey that Wore Spectacles.

"What sorts of people care most for pet animals?" asked a reporter of a Bird Fancier, "Such a variety of persons like pets," said he, "and they like them in so many ways and for so many reasons, that it is hard to say which ones have the call. Perhaps it's the good hearted people, and then perhaps it isn't. The biggest prize I ever got for a cat was $25, and that was from a man who would feel sore about giving thirty cents to a blind beggar. He was a man who One morning he came in here to collect a bill and a fine kitten of mine kept rolling against his leg. The widower made believe not to notice the pet, but at last he looked up to me quite suddenly and said, 'I suppose a man has got to love something.' He said it as though it was a sort of hard ship. Then he paid the price without grumbling.

"The wisest old chap that ever came into this store bought a terrier for a grandson of his who was a sort of an invalid.

"'My grandson's mighty fretful,' said the old gentleman, 'and he is hard to live with, but if he gets interested in this pup, he's pretty well off.' And sure enough he did get well. I have had quite a number of customers among people in good health. They were mostly ladies. Some women take to pets because they think no one else will care for them, or because they have been disappointed in love and want to care for something that will show affection.

"There is one curious difference between men and women pets. A man will sometimes sell one when it gets sick, but a woman will hold on to it until it gets old or dies. Women that have the genuine love for pet animals, seem to care all the more for pets that are sick. I have often seen little sick pets that they would not have fancied had the animals been well. A woman came here for a pug last winter, when I had advertised some very fine ones, and she confessed to take a spaniel that looked as though he wouldn't live a week. The dog got well and became the most affectionate animal I ever saw.

"I am oddly distant to anything in the nature of a watchdog. I wouldn't sell a watchdog if I allowed him to show too much familiarity or short acquaintance. Dogs intended to sell for pets must be kept just on the ragged edge of affection, as it were. They show too much love for the dealer, some ladies won't want them. I have had a tender-hearted lady remark that she wouldn't take a dog of mine because it would be cruel to part us. Of course, a circumstance of that kind injures a dealer's business.

"Artists prefer cats to other other pet animals, and they are first-rate judges. Large, fond marked tortoise-shell suits them well. I took in $70 from an artist one day for a superbly marked mottled grey. I had what we call the night and day state, and he spent an hour on having a graceful cat. Now, all cats are graceful, but some have more of an easy movement than others, and some have more style. There are lots of people who think it makes things look genteel to have a large cat around. Some of my highest tabbies have been sold to people who cared more about getting a cheerful effect in their rooms than they did for cats.

"Dogs do not seem to be in favor with musicians. A musician once told me he couldn't keep them because they barking grated on his ear. Hot musicians don't like to carry dog-baskets, and they scare at her dogs, and there is a belief in the trade that the only pet that goes well with musicians is a monkey. Monkeys and parrots are not genuine pets; they are curiosities.

"I have known monkeys to show great fondness for each other, but they do not care for human beings. A lady once had one of has three of them. She says that none of them ever bite her.

"People learn to dislike pets from queer causes. A woman came here to swap off a pet terrier because he barked one day when a little child came in. Another woman gave me back a monkey at half price because, when she came home, he was behind her back, she saw him in the glass.

"I sold a monkey that wore spectacles. I sold her that monkey because she said he looked so much like a man

MISSION OF THE CATHOLIC PARES.

Journalism is the greatest social power, because it is the most universal education. It is the education of great place, democratic opinion, and spiritual guidance for world. In our view, religious journalism is not only a useful and serious occupation, but only a work made possible by the wolfare of society, but a part of upon which the welfare of society depends. We do not think that journalism has its conscience and nerve in the truth, whatever it may be; always all, the Divine truth.—Rev. Dr. Thompson, Missouri Universe.

May God bless and direct through the instrumentality of the Monitor, the good work which it has begun, and which is present, the actions of Catholic journals who defend the cause of religion, its rights and those of the Holy Apostolic See, and labor in the conditions and principle with devotion and fidelity.—Pius IX.

Editorial Notes.

—It is understood that Switzerland is soon to have its long promised Catholic University, and that the first Rector will be the Very Rev. Canon Bourquenod, President of the College of Dalle, in Alsace.

—In consequence of the crowded state of our columns this week we are compelled to hold over until our next issue several editorial articles including "Answers to Protestant Tract No. 207."

—The MONITOR has the honor of having eight pastoral visitors on the staff of contributors, and three of them contribute as many poems to this issue. They appear on the second page and we know they will please every reader who relishes the benison of poetical thought when elegantly expressed by Catholic writers.

—In conversation with Rev. Joseph M. Quinlan, pastor of St. Louis Bertrand Church, of this city, says the Cincinnatti Telegraph, we learned from him an interesting fact. It is that Michael Davitt, the Irish patriot, accompanied both the Fathers Quinlan during the six weeks they spent exploring the Holy Land. Father Quinlan's pronounce Davitt to be "a good Catholic."

—When we set up until after midnight writing out the full text of Monsignor Capel's lecture on "The Catholic Church the Mainstay of American Institutions," we never imagined that such a paper as the Catholic World, published in the great city of New York, would steal it and publish it without credit, from another reflects no fame on any paper with the slightest pretensions to a Catholic sensorium.

—Just as the cholera was for the second time threatening Marseilles, the French Government rendered a somewhat tardy tribute of respect to a holy Religious, Mother St. Cyprien, Superiorem of the Sisters of St. Augustine, who for no less than forty-three years has been ready to flee at the sign of every epidemic that has visited that unhealthy town. The Journal Official of Sunday contains a decree signed by M. Jules Ferry ranking the service of this devoted servant of the sick, and naming her a Chevalier of the national order of the Legion of Honor.

Beneficial Influence of Catholic Institutions.

From Boston Monitor.

Catholic societies are spreading throughout this ecclesiastical Province and we hope ere many months to see every Catholic Parish faithful both to the Church and to each individual member. Catholic societies can be made a valuable auxiliary to the Church in her work in the world by keeping her children away from those mongrel associations where anti-Catholic traps are covered with the gossamer web of "Love, Friendship and Truth," or other catch-penny contrivances by which the souls of Catholics are sold for the insurance money or the sum stipend set forth in well-cooked By-Laws.

No Catholic was ever made more religious, more moral or more of a model citizen by associating himself with non-Catholic societies, while thousands of Catholics have been wrested from their allegiance to the Church by becoming members of benevolent, social or secret societies where Protestantism prevails under the flimsy veil of "non-sectarianism." Alluding to the beneficial influence which Catholic societies exercise when properly conducted under Episcopal sanction, the Central Catholic says with great truth that if there is one idea that ought never to be lost sight of in the Catholic mind it is the value of Catholic Societies. The world establishes Societies for its purposes. They effect a great deal, for the fact of organization is the fact of conquest. But sometimes they grow useless. They lose their object. They fall to pieces. But Catholic Societies have no such element in them. Their purpose are for an object whose interest never dies out—the object is salvation. In the higher lines of Catholic purpose let us look at the Jesuit who terms himself a member of a Society. What a world of wonder-work that Society has done, and the animating principle of it is only the simple principle of the salvation of the souls of its members and the salvation of the souls of the world. In an humble way the guiding rule of every Catholic Society can be found with the holy purpose crystallized in that great company of Jesus. There is not a Catholic brotherhood that can be founded which cannot be contributary to the generous purpose of saving the souls of others. There is not one that can be formed in which its members cannot perform associative works of charity. There is not one that can be formed whose members cannot give the associative example of virtue. There is not one that can be formed which as the years go by will not have the prayers of some soul saved by it to further its purpose. With these considerations clear to our minds we rejoice when we learn of a new Catholic Association being formed. The dioceses into which they enter are blessed, and the foundation of Catholic principles, Catholic practice, Catholic piety are laid. They teach charity, forbearance and piety. Use of the most useful for this high purpose is the Society of St. Vincent de Paul. It ought to be spread far and wide. Its is a very often overlooked, very often not thought of, and but too frequently not established. To establish it must be the work of the pastor. To carry it on must be the work of the people. Its most effective anonymous communications for the purpose of inciting us, vainly imagine that we get "mad" at their insulting effusions, but this is a great mistake. We rather enjoy this kind of literature, and invariably laugh at such snaks, but we do want them written in good English, and not in the horrible hash of bad spelling and blasphemy combined in the edifice effusions of the fellow who hails from Hollister.

—There are some English Catholics so thoroughly imbued with Cockneyism as to refuse to confess with their Irish co-religionists in securing liberal legislation for the Catholic body in England. For the benefit of these stiff-necked Britons Bishop Bagshawe of Nottingham has issued a Pastoral in which he thus lands the Irish for the great good they have done in England. "If," says this eminent Prelate, "Catholics are not to combine with any of the English parties it follows that they must either combine amongst themselves exclusively, or throw in their lot with their brethren, the Irish Catholic Party," and he declares at once with generous eloquence in favor of the latter course. "If they," he says, referring to Irish Catholics, "had not been our brethren we should have no political influence to use. We should be still under the penal laws (if may were left of us who had not apostatized or fallen into schism as Protestants Catholic Dissenters, or were Bishops nominated and paid by the English Government.) From these and many other evils, have we been saved by our Irish Catholic brethren, and, without them, all that church extension, for which we bless God, would have been impossible."

—Next to the Argonaut, the Occident of this city—the organ of the proscriptive, anti-secreting Presbyterian sect—is proving itself the champion exhumator of the Catholic Church on this coast. Last week—in falsely charging the Pope with changing his policy—it added this malignant and monstrous falsehood:

> Plus the Ninth bears as "Reforming Pope," and barely escaped assassination in consequence. After that he threw himself entirely into the hands of the Jesuits. Pope Leo may be bravo enough to rebel against "the Black Pope," as he is called, but he will not be unlikely. But he knows that if he does so, he does it at the peril of assassination from those who believe and teach that it is right to do evil that good may come.

The mendacious mind from whence such malevolent fabrications could emanate, has no more conception of Christianity than a skunk has of the observance of Sunday. Where does the Catholic Church teach that it is right "to do evil that good may come?" When was such an outrageous, satanic theory put into practice? The infamous charge is one of those manufactured falsehoods which have been successfully met and annihilated into "smithereens" by Catholic writers throughout the last three centuries, but which the preachers of the Gospel of Hollister, which the preachers of the Gospel of Hollister, which the preachers of the Gospel of Hollister,

Farm and Home.

Girls, Beware of Dudes.

The human mind is weak and easily led astray. This is true in every case, but in particular when the flexible minds of young, thoughtless ladies come into consideration. Young maidens should bear this in mind, and never lose sight of the sound adage that they belong to the weaker sex. The young ladies of our day have a great predilection in home and fashion matters for a vain, showy fellow who little trouble to fascinate their attention and devotion. It is not all gold that glitters. Exterior finery, polished and affected manners, a studied vocabulary and other dandyish affectations never act unfrequently the most useless part of characters and the most discreditable of dispositions. Such gaudy and hollow pups are found in large numbers everywhere, and it requires no keen observer to spot them. Girls, beware of such dudes.

Cleanliness, propriety, and politeness, we like to see observed by young men, and should be appreciated by all. foolish affectation, on the contrary, creates disgust and aversion in the eyes of all thinking people. Good and fine clothes, a gold watch and chain, silk handkerchiefs, and such like, are very becoming indeed, not, however, to those who earned and worked to enjoy such luxuries. Extravagance is contemptible and sinful, and is, generally speaking, the first steps to failure and poverty. It is a silly and stupid pride, and pride comes always before the fall.

Ashamed of their ordinary working clothes, they appear neatly in their very best in the fashionable resort at that.

Besides, these dudes manage by not paying their washer-woman and tailor, to attend operas and theatres. They always to play the gentleman, but prove to be homeless scamps. With a sublime and misconceived assurance of their appreciation, they impudently intrude on the society of more reflecting people, and become irksome even to their best friends. Notwithstanding these objectionable features in a young man's character, they find their devoted admirers among the weaker sex. And what is more surprising, apparently thoughtful and sensible young ladies protemate their attention.

To all such young maidens we repeat: Beware of dudes!

Mustard and Pneumonia.

Writing to the New York World a gentleman says: "Pneumonia can be cured if the person will apply promptly over the lungs a position of plaster made of mustard and flaxseed meal, keeping quiet and warm in bed. Prompt action is of vital importance, and there is no occasion for waiting for the arrival of an 'old-fashioned' or 'new-fashioned' practitioner. The simple remedy may be applied by any one, and if taken in season will, I think, always be effective. In my first personal experience my determination to try it was prompted, even for a day, some near coating me my life. The one was neglected till an eminent physician said that at any right time would be of just as much use to me out on the table as in the condition it then was, a fact of which I was already pretty well aware; but the material and flaxseed poultice mastered the disease and restored my lung to its normal condition, as good as new. In the second attack, a year later, the case was taken in hand promptly, the poultice applied, quiet and warmth maintained, and speedy recovery ensued without a physician being called." Mustard is an old-fashioned remedy, and its healing virtues can hardly be over-estimated. It has saved our household many a doctor's bill.

Around the House.

This maiden tied over jars keeps out insects and admit air.

When bread will not retain the dent of the finger it is ready for the oven.

Half a cup of vinegar in the water will make an old fowl cook quickly.

When making dumplings for soup put in one at a time and they will not stick together.

Collings that have been smoked by a raccoons lamp should be washed off with soda and water.

Never boil oysters in milk, but cook them in water, then season with butter and put them in a dish with hot milk.

Cayenne pepper blown into the cracks where ants congregate will drive them away. The same remedy is also good for mice.

If you have any old muslin dresses that are good and still are faded and so unfit to wear, it is a good time to try the experiment of bleaching them, and if of good quality they will do much service as nonsuch dresses. Most of the delaines need muslins can be bleached by boiling them in strong soap suds, and then laying them on the grass for a day or two; others may have weak ammonia added to the water.

True Politeness.

Riding often in public conveyances one soon learns to know the "gentle-mannered" man, and one often sees such instances of quiet, thoughtful gentleness, and unobtrusive politeness, such regard for old age, weakness and infancy as show that the spirit of gentleness is not extinct, in spite of all the hurry and rush of Young America. While we hold that persons who enter a public conveyance, when they see there is no room for them, should not expect any passenger to rise and give them a seat, yet there are cases when it would seem to be the first impulse of any one with an observant eye and kindly feeling to do so without hesitation.

An old woman, bowed and infirm, with a heavy bundle in her bare wrinkled hands, which bore the marks of many years of weary toil, once entered a crowded horse-car, and endeavored to support her trembling frame against the door. No one offered her a seat, though the one was filled with people younger than herself by two score of years. She was too poor and humble looking for any of the young men who thought themselves gentlemen to offer her their places, as they would probably have done to a younger and fashionably dressed lady: A noble-looking woman, plainly but elegantly attired, sat near her. Her eyes met the poor down the rows of passengers, who appeared not to have noticed the old woman. Her lip curled a little; and, rising, she said, "Madam, take my seat."

"No!" hotly protested the old woman, "I thank you, but I can stand very well if I lean against the door."

"But you must take it," said she, persuasively. "I should be ashamed of myself did I sit while one so much older stood." And she put out her hand and assisted the old woman to her seat.

Two men shamed into politeness rose and offered the lady their places, but she refused them. The courtesy that could not be shown to the old woman on account of her age and poverty should not be extended to her.

Family Fun.

Five Obedient Husbands.

There were five of them together, and it was late. They had been drinking. Finally, one of them looked at the clock, and said:

"What will our wives say when we come home?

"Let them say what they want to. Mine will tell me to go to the mischief," responded No. 2.

"I'll tell you what we will do. Let us meet here again in the morning, and tell our experiences. Let the one who has refused to do what his wife told him to when he got home pay for this evening's entertainment."

"That's a good idea. We will agree to that." So the party broke up and went to their respective homes.

Next morning they met at the appointed place, and began to tell their experiences. Said No. 1: "When I opened the door my wife was awake. She said, 'A pretty time of night for you to be coming home. You had better go out and sleep in the pig pen, for that's what you will come to, sooner or later, anyhow.' Rather than pay for all we had drank last night, I did what she told me to. That lets me out."

No. 2 cleared his throat, and said: "When I got home I stumbled on a chair, and my wife asked, 'There you are again, you old drunken brute! You had better wake up the children, and stage about the room for awhile, so they can see what a drunken sot a father can be!' I did so with." I thought the best thing I could do under the circumstances was to obey: so I woke up the children and stumbled around until my wife hinted to me to stop. She said a chair is conveying the hint. That let's me out."

No. 3 spoke up and said: "I happened to stumble over the pan of dough, and my wife said, 'Dumb again! Hasn't you had to sit down in that dough? So I sat down in it, and that let's me out."

No. 4 said: "I was humming a tune, and my wife called out, 'There you are again! Hadn't you had enough to drink for one night?' I said, 'Certainly,' and began to sing as loud as I could. But she told me to stop, or she would throw something at me, so I stopped. That let's me out."

No. 5 looked very disconsolate. He said: "I reckon I'll have to pay. My wife told me to do something none of you would have done, if you had been in my place."

"What was it?"

"She said, 'So you thought you would come home at last! Now mind, I'm better go out to the well and drink a couple of buckets of water, just to astonish your stomach!' That was more than I had bargained for; so it's my funeral."

No Room in Heaven for Him.

He stood before St. Peter and meekly appealed for admission to the Better Land.

"Can't admit you, sir," said St. Peter, "there is no room in Heaven for such as you."

"Haven't I served the lord of the land?"

"Yes, in the main."

"Haven't I observed the laws of the land?"

"Yes, as a rule."

"What, then, has been my offense?"

"You wanted to stop your neighbor, and instead of dropping a line to the publishers you had the postmaster send him a card with a message to the effect that his paper was 'refused.' Such a man as you could would send no congenial company in Heaven, so, please speed on to the land where they don't shovel snow."

He got it at Last.

Widow to medium—"Is my husband happy in the spirit land?"

Medium—"Very happy indeed."

"Then, tonight Hiram, he's got a blanket."

"Got what, madam?"

"A protoffice."

Quite a Difference.

A paper gave an account of a society event, and, in speaking of one beautiful lady, of quite large proportions, the editor wrote: "Mrs.——possesses a form that a Juno might envy." The editor sent home and left a subordinate to get out the paper, and the next morning he was horrified to read: "Mrs.——possessed a form that Jumbo might envy."

He Eats Porterhouse Now.

Two colored barbers, one an old man and the other a young one. The young one took off his apron and started out of the door.

"Yo's gwan to git a drink, Jim? asked the elder.

"Dat's what I'm gwan to do."

"Do and git yo' drunk. I p'ceet ter do sense ting when I was young. When I was first married dah was a gin-mill next do' do shop whe' I worked, and I spent in it fifty and seventy-five cents a day outer de dollah I ba' I rahned in. Wall, one mawnin' I went into de butcher shop, and I ordered cum in dat fo' de man wat kep' the likker shop.

"'Gib me ten or twelve pounds po'terhouse steak,' said he.

"He got it and went out. I sneaked up to de butcheh and locked he ha' rah mound I had ief.

"'Wat do you want?' said the butcheh.

"'Oh me ten cents' wif of libber,' was my remark.

"'I tun wil I good pay fur. Now yo' gib me dat po' steak. Yo'll eat libber, but a man wal sets yo' de steak will bee his po'terhouse steak. De man bahin' de bah ordy po'terhouse—de man in front ain libber. I ain't touched de stuff fo' thirty years, and I am sotin' po'terhouse myself.

What Joining the Choir Did.

"Are you a Christian, sir?" asked a pious-looking individual of a man he met at a prayer-meeting.

"Yer say of the young men who thought themselves gentlemen to offer her their places, as they would probably have done to a younger and fashionably dressed lady: A noble-looking woman, plainly but elegantly attired, sat near her. Her eyes met the poor down the rows of passengers, who appeared not to have noticed the old woman. Her lip curled a little; and, rising, she said, "Madam, take my seat."

CATHOLIC SERVICES FOR AMERICAN PATRIOTS.

SAN FRANCISCO, August 27th, 1885.

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR:

Dear Sir—The fact that three companies of the Red Regiment, N. G. C., who are drilling while in camp at Santa Cruz, were invited by the Commanding Officer of that regiment to attend the religious services according to the rites of the Catholic Church, seems to me, as it must to the Editor of the Argonaut, little short of a miracle. Perhaps it is the first time in the history of the Pacific Coast that a Protestant regiment, as such, has ever been ordered to attend Catholic services, or any other similar body of men.

The Irish Brigade (which consisted of the 69th, 69th and 88th, New York, the 28th, Mass., and 116th, Penn., regiments,) during the whole period of its service with the Army of the Potomac, (which was from the organization of that army by the noble McClellan, until its disbandment, after the surrender of Gen. Lee's army,) never failed to have the Holy Sacrifice offered up, celebrated by the Chaplain with the assistance of those who either represented or were Catholics.

The Sunday morning at a given hour, the captains or company commanders invited any one of other denominations, who did not desire to attend the Catholic service, to step to the front, he then asked them if they wished to attend service in a separate tent, which they invariably made in some instances near by, and, if so, they were invited (or marched) off to the tent of their choice; those who did not wish to change my service, had to remain in their tents or with the Orderly of Rear and to them until the whole regiment had marched off.

Without the Battle of Antietam, while the Army of the Potomac lay at Harper's Ferry, the Irish Brigade, marched in a body to the Catholic Church in that town every Sunday morning, with its level and beautiful Chaplain, Father Thos. Prendo Meagher, at its head. The Brigade, at that time, formed part of General Hancock's Division.

The writer himself, served with that Brigade from its organization, until its disbandment, between three and four years, and, notwithstanding I am a layman, he mingled freely among the officers and men of the Brigade, and, consequently, saw or heard, if anything of an offensive character had occurred, or, rather, it is due to him, that he heard a single objection or word of complaint, because an acknowledged body of brave men had proceeded to worship their Creator according to the dictates of their own conscience.

Probably General Hancock and the Commanding Generals of the Army of the Potomac were not aware of the anomaly of the order they permitted in allowing this Irish Brigade and many other Irish regiments "to encamp for worship per and propter," etc., by attending the Church of their choice, and, in fact, they, by carrying their loyal army flag, by their side, which the Brigade had, and which they did through with the Stars of shot and shell, and which they carried to its until the last Confederate laid down his arms, made the valued Priest was necessary to be absent.

Now, I embrace the opportunity Mr. Pixley lost by not going to the front himself to defame of the Bigots in the Dioceses of the Union, and by his personal magnetism and convincing logic, induce the Commander in Chief of the Army of the Potomac, to change the Green Flag, "the Pagan Irish," Protestant Brigade, and, in the forthcoming, who proved themselves true to the flag they fought under, and which they did through with the Stars of shot and shell, and which they carried to its until the last Confederate laid down his arms, made the valued Priest was necessary to be absent

THE DEAD MOTHER.

Memory to-night brings back to my heart
Visions of days that are gone,
Beautiful pictures long hidden from sight,
Pictures of scenes that cover a them.

And talent among them is that of my mother,
Uselss and sweet as of olden,
As Fancy was ever round her her charm so enchanting
That portrits of beauty is always in vogue.

Two lonely years have rolled on since we parted,
Since my dear mother was laid in her tomb!
Since we placed the sweet May-flowers over her coffin,
And felt that with her it was dark.

Gently we laid her to sleep 'neath the daisies;
Weary hands folded in silence at rest;
Sadly we turned from all we held dearest,
And left in our home an aching heaveth best.

Not oft in the twilight when shadows are stealing,
A sad, lonely feeling will come;
And no one can soften, save Him who bereft us,
That heart-aching yearning for mother and home.

Though kind friends and true have gathered about us,
We miss the dear one, never-more face.
Those gentle hands, smoothing the thorns from our pathway
Ah! no one can fill our dead mother's place.

Then sleep, gentle mother, sleep sweet on the hillside,
Soft zephyrs chant over your grave.
Soon not by prayer for your motherless children,
Till we meet in that home of the good and the blessed.

"CLEAR THE LINES!"

"Clear the Lines!"—our country rallies
To the olden flight-words,
Ulster's glens and Munster's valleys
Echo their thousands to the plaid;
Ireland's thrall at last is smiling,
North and South clasp hands across twine,
Hark! their mighty chorus blending,
"Lone of freedom, "Clear the Lines!"

"Clear the Lines!"—the day is breaking,
Dipping all our hills with gold,
Ahead, the battle-ground is waking,
Hands cast, weapons grasped and hold,
Tyranny shall reign no longer
Trembling between with all the tenacity of Begins every nerve the stronger,
For the cause—"Clear the Lines!"

"Clear the Lines!"—our glorious vanished,
Tower and town in dark decay,
Ireland's best at fallen's banshees,
Ireland's wealth the foeman's prey.
Fire alone must be used by hands stalwart,
Hill and vale sentinel by kine—
Fire! Fire! Fire!—"Clear the Lines!"—
Rebkion spotless, "Clear the Lines!"

"Clear the Lines!"—the coward's vanishing
Vainly cloaks his heart of fear—
Ours are souls that know not dawning,
Crown prey'r object near.
Tender ties, and a tear-filled mother,
Tighter still our chains you twine,
Evening hours and sunset-tinted
Clings of Freedom—"Clear the Lines!"

"Clear the Lines!"—their aesthetic speaches
Oft have turned our suffering lain,
Ulster's warning lessons teach us
Saxon vows are writ on sand,
Again speak vain Saxon cunning
Treachery as a hidden mine,
Lying word and pallid shinning,
Brothers, forward!—"Clear the Lines.

"Clear the Lines!"—the sun is rising
By the Flag that's o'er us waves,
By the tomb we've sworn to defend,
By our fathers' bloody graves,
By the burning wrongs that galled us,
Broken pledges, and plundered shrine—
Ulster's chain no more shall bind us—
On to Freedom!—"Clear the Lines."

MOTHERS DOT.

BY GEORGE COOPER.

Have you seen a radiant mother,
With a bright and pleasant face,
Ever, at his Queen's command,
To serve with her lamplight gaze,
Do you marks that smile upon her
When a child of mine is by?
Do you would have the mother's pleasure—
Mother's joy!

Quick to note the passing trouble
Is a home in her one day;
Always eager to oppose her cause
Will be her sweet nature's way.
Oh, the loving arms, the kisses,
Something of her day's or joy!
Where's the mother who'd not miss him!
Mother's boy!

What to her the years that, sobbing,
Fragment of sad fish, "done to a tempy"
What to him the youthful boys that fly,
And light the pain or sorrow
She is still the queen he worshiped
With a service crowned with joy;
No will be to her forever
Mother's boy!

Pastime whatever of childhood,
Tell us who has gained the prize
In the war and struggle of the world
Among the great, the wise—
"Tis the mother who has answered
To life's demand, have delivered
Faithful service to a mother—
Mother's boy!

Vatican Monument of the Council.

The inauguration of the Monument in commemoration of the Ecumenical Vatican Council, is announced as imminent; the large slabs of marble in which the base thereof have already been arranged to the number of the Fathers, and bear the distinct site of the Monument Immediately behind the Altar of Confession, will be very simple, as to style, a colossal, handsome African marble is one entire shaft, found in the quarries of Carrara, as far back as 1870; the base of the column will base on one side the anathemas of Leo XIII, and on the other that of Pius IX. Above the anathemas will be inscribed appropriate relations to the Council. The material of the Monument, ready since 1870, was derived from the Sculptor of the Cardinal Canonicoge, at the Palace of the Chancellerie.

— Father Ryan, the poet-priest of the South, will next year publish a new volume of poems, "A Crown For Our King." He is improving in his health and about Christmas will be able to again, lecturing in the interest of the Carmelite Convent of New Orleans, whose debt he has undertaken to pay.

Literary Miscellany.

Mr. Taber's Coincidence.

BY R. P. SHILLERS.

Mr. Taber was a mild old gentleman, who lived in a quiet manner on a very quiet street. He had seen better days, but had "outlived his usefulness," as was said by the uncomfortable. Unfortunate, he had in his advance to the necessity of maintaining vigor and physical activity, and therefore Mr. Taber was not useless, for he possessed a cheerful and happy spirit, that carried it self for the happiness of others. Wherever he went he carried a welcome with him and he imparted sunshine to every circle he visited. His use was in the quiet delusions of pleasure; and many an active man should have been less missed, were he taken away, than good Mr. Taber. Though with nothing to do apparently, he was every day to be seen in public places, and always, had a chair allotted to him in the old commercial reading room, which he had frequented in earlier days. To those who knew him the wonder was how he subsisted—for his fellows in business years ago had been hopelessly ruinous, and to those who did not, he might have seemed a gentleman in moderate circumstances, drawing support from his income properly. Few knew that the small house he occupied was held merely on a life tenure, suffered by a hasient creditor; but he kept up a very respectable appearance, and was as cheerful on Change, and showed as much interest in passing events, as though he had millions and millions at stake.

His house was a marvel of neatness on the outside, wearing an aspect of modest gentility, and no one could dream that within, there was a condition of poverty, bare hearty upon the occupants, that pride alone—the pride of former prosperity—enabled them to endure. These moments of Mr. Taber and his daughter, Mary—the last of his family, his wife and the children having died long before—and he sling to his home, with all the tenacity of an old man, received to "hold the fort" as long as possible, whatever the cost or distances. He never made a sign of need, and his daughter, equally proud, maintained the family "respectability" bravely, for her father's sake. They doubtless received remittances occasionally, from some distant source, and were enabled to keep the wolf from the door, but this was never revealed by any outward indication.

It was wonderful how sharp are feminine eyes to detect what is not intended to be seen—the effort to conceal, may be, aiding the detection, and a kind neighbor of the Tabers, having dropped in at a time of deep depression, saw enough to convince her that all was not as it should be. She sat with Mary during her visit in the kitchen, and, though the girl seemed exhibarant with gaiety, felt that this was merely a forced prevailing sense of hidden care. There was no confidence exchanged, and to offer assistance, would, the neighbor felt, be an unpardonable offence, so she did the next thing—she kept—to herself by telling it to her husband as soon as she got home.

"Something must be done for them," she said.

"But how?" he asked. "They are so proud as Lucifer."

They talked the matter over seriously, discussing this and that mode, until, striking his wife upon the shoulder, he said:

"I have an idea," he said, "that a surprise party would meet them in their abilities! Surprise parties are too common," she said, "and they would suspect the motive, strangest circumstance I ever knew. I do wish I had some refreshment to offer you, Mr. Manners, and he knew it would be agreeable to the rest, and so they consulted together, and the result of it, my dear sir," said Mr. Manners; "but I would thank you for a glass of water."

"We'll call it nectar," said Mr. Taber. During the pauses in the conversation, myriad thoughts crowded upon him, and the ringing of crockery had been heard in the adjoining room, this Mr. Taber supposed to proceed from "clearing away," and that some friend had returned with her, which accounted for the whispering. He rose to reach the desired fluid, when, as he opened the door dividing the parlor from the room beyond, a sense burst upon his sight that almost took his breath away. There was a table spread, filled with a profusion of good things, from cousous to mutton; and there were other sensgatators, busied with preparations, with a stewed, and Mary, whisked returned, radiant with fun, who welcomed Mr. Taber with a shout. He could not speak a word. The others then hurried in to form a tableau of the most joyous character.

"Well, gentlemen," said the old man, finding voice at last, "I don't know what this all means, but that it means well I cannot doubt. This is a scene of surprise."

"Not so much of a coincidence," though as you imagined, said Mr. Jones; "we twelve concerted the "Do-as-you-please-like," whose habit is to enjoy a good time once in a while, and make such use of their single boy's persons and premises, in so doing, as circumstances warrant. We have selected you and your abode for our purposes, to night, hoping you and your daughter to join us, and we have assigned to you the head of the table by unanimous vote, from which, according to the rules of our club, there is no appeal."

This explained everything to the entire satisfaction of Mr. Taber, who, after a little expostulation, presided, and a thoroughly good time was enjoyed, but it was wonderful what small appetites that club possessed. They ate scarcely anything, but poured copious libations in hot coffee that smoked from the board, it was almost midnight before they knew it, when wishing Mr. Taber continued health they bade him good night.

"My old friend," said Mr. Manners, "we have enjoyed a delightful evening, and you may, as we shall, recur to it in after time, wherever I have all our names here, in this envelope, that you may, in recalling this incident, know who we are."

"Certainly, most certainly," replied Mr. Taber, "I shall often think of it. And I assured—

But they were gone, a faint "Good-night" coming to him as he closed the door.

The provisions that the "club" left, Mr. Taber thought, he had concluded, Mr. Taber felt justified in using, the more so because he did not know what else to do with them, and for several days there was no lack of food, upon the imagination for supplies. Provoking, he said, which they had served doubled, and more mysteriously to Mary and her father, it was thankful.

"Well, dollars," cried Jones as if taken aback on entering the room, "why you have a party here already. Manners, how are you! Sister, Smith, how is it with you? Why, I thought we should be all friends here! Go to Freedom!—"Clear the Lines." T. H.

Great Musician's Wives.

The following facts in connection with a celebrated musician, whose importance was reconsidered by Mendelssohn, and also been growing since in the estimation of the musical public, will be found interesting. He married his cousin Barbara in 1787 and settled down with her at Marienbaum, in Thuringia. Barbara was musical, played well and was a fine singer. Her voice, Kelly, said Co. on the 28th August, 1887, was "of the very reasonable story about how they came there—had got lost in the snow, I think, while going to visit a sick brother, or something of that sort, and thought they would call on him, his home being near. Mr. Taber was sincerely glad to see them, and was beaming with smiles when the doorbell rang again. With a surprised expression, he went again to the door, and this time there were three in the blinding snow, whom he knew and welcomed as he had the others.

"Thought you might be lonely on such a night," said Jones as he took off his coat and rubbers, "I get Asher and Speed to come with me. All alone, aunt you?"

"Come in and see," said the old man, gleefully.

"Dollars," cried Jones as if taken aback on entering the room, "why you have a party here already. Manners, how are you! Sister, Smith, how is it with you? Why, I thought we should be all friends here! Go to Freedom!—"Clear the Lines." T. H.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Many Eminent Works which were Refused by Publishers.

Mr. William Andrews, in an article entitled "Declined with Thanks" in Home Chimes, gives some interesting instances of celebrated works that have been declined by publishers. The writer says:—

The most notable example of a story which was offered to publisher after publishing only to be returned to the author, is that of "Robinson Crusoe." It was at last published by Mr. Taylor, in the Ship in Paternoster-row, 1719, and the publisher made a profit of five on one of the earliest editions of the immortal story. Dr. Johnson's Rasselas—Author's Edition—was published in 1759

Farm and Home.

Mothers to Blame.

The plain fact of the case is that the American mother of the poorer classes is more careless of her duty than the mother of any other nation. The daughter of a decent French tradesman or artisan would never be allowed to go for balls unprotected, or clandestinely to pick up chance acquaintances in the street. On the other hand it is only within a very few years that the young girl of the genteler class in America has been properly protected from insult and snares by the constant presence of her mother or some one wiser in the world's ways than herself. No matter how poor a girl is, the moral atmosphere about her may be as pure as if she were reared in a palace provided her mother will it. She may not be able to give her daughter money, or even education, but she can give her a sense of honor as high as Heroines. To do it she will not turn her loose on the street to carry on flirtations with married men, or send her unprotected to balls, while she remains at home satisfied that the "young folks should have their fun." This is plain talk; but mothers who will read it know that it is true, and know, too, how much they are to blame that it is true.

How to Hang Pictures.

One of the ordinal principles necessary to learn about hanging pictures is the fact that the light of the picture should come from the same side as the light in the picture.

A picture highly worked up in detail should be hung closer to the eye than a strong, broad composition, in which all the parts are put on in masses.

Pictures immediately on the line of average sight should be hung flat on the wall, while those above it should be slightly tipped forward.

Large pictures in heavy frames should never be hung over sofas or chairs that are placed close to the wall.

Groups of pictures are only be effective when there is harmony in subject and color, and similarity in framing.

No greater absurdity is ever committed in the way of picture decorations than in the adornment of the walls of the average dining-room.

Representations of strings of fish just hauled from the water and seeming yet to gasp for breath, or groups of dead birds and noble deer struggling in the death agony, or fighting for life before their pursuers, are far from appetizing, and a perpetual plea for the doctrine of vegetarianism. But few pictures should ever be hung in the dining-room, and the greatest care should be taken in their selection.

Household Notes.

Never use water from a stone reservoir for cooking purposes.

Carpets should be thoroughly beaten on the wrong side first and then from the right side, after which spots may be removed by the use of naphtha or ammonia and water.

It is not known to every woman, but it is a fact, that mustiness can be sewed together; a stout thread is needed, and the edges must not be drawn too tightly together, as of course there must be no seam, but simply a joining of the edges.

Furniture needs cleansing as much as other woodwork. It may be washed with warm soap suds, quickly wiped dry, and then rubbed with an oily cloth. To polish it rub with rotten stone and sweet oil. Clean off the oil and polish with chamois skin.

Ants will forsake any food for lard, and they can be exterminated by greasing a plate with that substance and placing in their vicinity. When the plate is well covered turn hot water upon it, and a few applications will do the work effectually.

Remove mildew from linen by wetting the spot, rubbing on chalk, and exposing it to the air. Dilute lemon juice will take mildew from woollen stuffs. A weak solution of chloride of lime can be applied to almost any fabric, but must be used with care, especially upon some colors.

Those who have tired paint upon the walls of a room speak very strongly in its favor. It closes up the pores of the plaster so that it cannot absorb bad odors; it can be easily cleaned with soda and water (soap and water make it spotty); it can be made any desired tint. In washing painted walls, it is a good plan to remove from the walls everything that can be injured by steam, and then hang sheets wrung from hot water in the room. The vapor condensing on the wall soften the dirt, and it may be wiped off with woollen cloths wrung from soda.

Holy Catholic Mothers.

"There is no place like home." Happiness is greatest where the religious teachings use her influence judiciously.

It is true that the qualities of a good mother are so numerous, the difficulties of her position so great, and her physical strength so limited that it is not surprising we have so few mothers whom we can call models. Perfection can be reached only by few, but all can aim at performing the duties of their high office, so as to make life happy and home attractive.

Catholic mothers, your office is a high one. The holiest creature that hallowed this our earth, performed her difficult duties and left an example to you of patient suffering and unremitting care.

Who can tell the terrible results on a home where the mother's influence is spoiled by petulance or irreligion. Instead of bright and buoyant looks and the ringing laugh of lighthearted innocence, we have funeral gloom and cruel discord, always producing estrangement, sometimes hate where unity and love should prevail. Young lives wrecked, little hearts soddened and the family scattered, look for the members now in the crowded alley, the low saloon or the police reports. Thousands to-day feel a blank, because the sacredness of home has been violated, and an idol shrine has been done that never can be remedied. Catholic mothers, your duties are difficult, but your rewards, even in the natural order, are very great.

Reforming Husbands.

Don't marry a man of bad habits with the idea of reforming him. He is already formed beyond your power to change, long before he gets ready to marry. Maybe you think he will do anything for you because he loves you, but he won't. If he won't give up tobacco or strong drink for sweetheart's sweetheart for the sake of his own self-respect, he will not do it for the love of any woman. Trust no spasmodic pretense; not one in a thousand ever gives up permanent practices when he has once become addicted to them, and you won't afford to trust your happiness to so small a chance of possibility as that. A man of bad habits is like a guarded and crooked tree; you may bend a twig and lop off a tiny branch here and there, but it is not in the nature of things for you to make him straight and shapely now. He won't help it and you can't help it; but don't trust your happiness to him.

Syrup of Figs.

Sample bottles free, and large bottles for sale by all Druggists.

Family Fun.

Not Much Information.

"I do not see any peculiarity about your people," said an Eastern judge, addressing his traveling companion, a well known Arkansas lawyer. "I have traveled quite extensively in the State, and I have not, as yet, met with the eccentricity of action and gravamination of reply that has often amused me in the newspapers.

"You have done most of your traveling by rail," said the lawyer. "Than is your first trip away from the main roads. I'll show you some of our genuine natives. Yonder is a house. Call the landlord, and speak to him."

"Hallo!" cried the judge.

"Comin!" the man replied, depositing a chair in the doorway and advancing.

"How's all the folks?"

"Children's hearty; wife's not well. Ain't what you call bed sick, but just sort o' stretchy, as we say."

"Got anything to eat in the house?"

"Ef I had it anywhar, I'd have it in the house, of course.

"How long have you been living here?"

"Too long."

"How many years?"

"I have been here ever since my oldest boy was born."

"What year was he born?"

"The year I owns here."

"How old is your boy?"

"Ef he had lived he would have been the oldest until pit, but, as he died, Jim's the oldest now and all."

"How old is Jim?"

"He ain't as old as the one that died."

"Well, how old was the one that died?"

"He was older than Jim."

"What do you do for a living?"

"Eat."

"How do you get anything to eat?"

"The best way we kin."

"How do you spend the Sundays?"

"Like the week days."

"Is that your daughter yonder?"

"No, sir; she ain't my daughter yonder nor any whar else."

"Is she a relative of yours?"

"No, sir; no kin."

"Kin to your wife?"

"No kin at all to my wife, but she's kin to my children."

"How do you make that out?"

"She is my wife."

"How far off is the next house?"

"It is called three miles, but the man that owns it is thinkin' a liar."

"I've got enough," said the judge, turning to the lawyer. "Drive on. I'll pay the man who depends on this man for information."

An Irishman's Ruse.

It is said to be the custom at Monte Carlo to fill the pockets of suicides with bank-notes, so that it may be assumed they did not kill themselves on account of losses. The story goes that a presumably dead Irishman, knowing the custom, succeeded in getting his pockets filled a short time ago. After losing a small sum at the gaming tables he suddenly jumped up, exclaimed—"I am ruined!" and he rushed into the gardens. Almost immediately afterwards the guards heard a pistol shot and then a cry of pain, and rushing to the spot found the Irishman, apparently dead. It was dark, with no one around, so they filled his pockets with money, and left him to be discovered in the morning. They had scarcely gone out of sight, however, before the Irishman was on his feet again and skipping about in a most lively style.

A Brutal Husband.

"My husband is a brute!" exclaimed Mrs. Nagg, as she entered her sister's parlor. "He found fault with a little scrawly of mine yesterday, and I threw a sandbinder at his head; then what do you suppose he did?" "I don't know," said Mrs. Jay, stood before the mirror so that I couldn't throw the other." "Oh, the brute!"

Why they were Called Baptists.

A Baptist minister, fishing near Cape Cod, received a strange fish, and asks of the skipper:

"What manner of fish is this, my good man? It has a curious appearance."

"Why! Only been round here this year."

"What do you call it?"

"We call 'em Baptists."

"Why so?"

"Cause they spile so quick after they come out of the water."

They Never Speak Now.

"Don't you think our rings would become you? inquired Kootsuko Murphy of Birdie McGee. Kootsuko had been paying Birdie marked attentions of late.

"O, I don't know," replied Birdie, demurely.

"I suppose the reason you don't wear them is because it will hurt to have your ears bored.

"O, not in the least," said Birdie, with animation. "I've had that done already years since—when I was quite young, in fact, for the last three weeks."

THE KOOTSUKO BAND PAYING BIRDIE MCGEE SOME SEASONABLE ATTENTIONS OF LATE.

It Scares the Fish.

"I think this Sunday ball playing is very sinful.

"It ought to be stopped."

"So it ought. Why, last Sunday two or three of us were out fishing and the player in the nine field made such a racket that we didn't catch a single fish."

Circumstantial Evidence.

Kootsuky Coroner (holding inquest)—You think the body is that of Col. Blood?

Witness—I am quite sure it is, sir.

Coroner—In what pocket was the bottle found?

Witness—Hip pocket.

Coroner—H'm. Likely Col. Blood. Any whiskey?

Witness—No, sir; it was empty.

Coroner—Evidently Col. Blood. Pint or quart bottle?

Witness—Quart bottle, sir.

Coroner—Gentlemen, there lies all that remains of our famous friend, Col. Blood.

Modern Family Pride.

Little Girl from Chicago—Our family is a more aristocratic family than yours.

Little Girl from Boston—No, it isn't. My mother can boast of her forefathers for the last two centuries.

Little Girl from Chicago—Oh, that is nothing. My mother can boast of four husbands in the last two years.

SEND US LOCAL CATHOLIC NEWS.

We would again respectively ask the Rev. Clergy or any of our readers of the entire Pacific Coast to send us local items of general interest. We would make the MONITOR a chronicle of all Ecclesiastic happenings relating to the progress of religion. We would also do so minus we are left in the dark as to the knowledge of the facts in their keeping. Now facts are all we want. Will our friends please furnish us with them?

THE GOOD ACCOMPLISHED BY A VETERAN MISSIONARY.

VIRGINIA CITY, Sept. 5, 1885.

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR:

Dear Sir—The venerable form of that saintly Father of Lorette, Father Lacombe, is well known from our valleys. He is gone to other and better fields, but he left behind him a sense of Christian truth and Christ-like charity, which lasting long after his departure, will be a blessing to many.

Night succeeds night, and the stars, the sentinels of the Triune God, that He eternal years may be employed in the honors of Abraham. But, although the soul-stirring strains of his powerful voice, knocking irresistably at the hardened heart, so soon sways the faithful members of St. Mary's Parish; although the spacious aisles and galleries of our beautiful Church, are so more crowded to excess with attentive listeners, anxious to drink in the satisfied word of truth from the only authorized source; although the Catholic population of this busy territory, of life, as in the pointed halls of our universities, or the lowly hamlets of the spur workmen, who falls away down in the bowels of the earth, the name of Father Bouchard is reverently mentioned in fond benediction, his pathetic sermons the theme of every tongue.

The opening sermon, which he delivered when Father Tuhman said last Mass on Sunday week, was but an epitome of what the Mission would be, and well did his subsequent discourses prove how well founded were the sanguine hopes he had formed of his labors in the harvest. Who is there, who had the pleasure of being at the Mission, who did not feel his heart bound within him at that touching appeal, "Behold, I have already captivated." Even those who were blinded by prejudice or the bigotry begotten of erroneous doctrines, were not proof against the fervid eloquence of the speaker, pressed by his discourses. His burning words coming from his great soul to have an hour with the truth, were prominently calculated to dispel the motive, unknown, of the Mission—not ministers of God's Word—and the slanderous manipulators of an infidel press, indulging in spread broadcast throughout the land.

Nothing is more difficult than it is impossible to give any idea of his sermons. Each one, for one week, produced such a general elation, that surpassed anything I have ever heard, but as I remark, I cannot refrain from referring to his unsurpassed ability to impress and fascinate those who call on Catholics intolerant bigots, that, in addition to another source of salvation for those who are not within the Barque of Peter. In his own Christian manner he gave to the people the shares as a note of the True Church. "For," said he, "If Christ's Church be no more intolerant than Christ Himself, then she teaches no more in this respect than He commanded her to teach. For the Catholic Church is no more intolerant than Christ. Christ said, 'Whosoever believeth not shall be damned.' Christ's man is born again of water and the Holy Spirit, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of Heaven. He who believeth not shall be saved, but he who believeth not shall be condemned." It shall be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrah in the Day of Judgment than for you. Hence, it is a necessary condition for Christ's Church to be as intolerant as He was, and say one and a half hundred Mayoral are lost from the very mouth of Holy Writ that Christ spoke on this point, and intolerant of every at truth must ever be. Therefore, all who wish to preserve the unity of the faith, and to be saved, must be in union with the Catholic Church, outside the golden portals, nothing but the shadows of eternal night prevail. He never was so loud marshaled security and infallibly to joy immortality.

But his efforts were chiefly directed to arouse those indifferent Catholics, to a strong sense of their duty; to make them feel a glorious pride in the proud position of members of the only Church which claims and proves her claim to be the only teacher and to be the salvation of the earth, so that the whole world may have but one Faith, one Lord, one Baptism; and in this desperate age can anything be greater or more apart than the Church of Christ, and the Church of Satan? Christ's Church, the Church founded on the rock, firm as the million, yet is ever young, ever vigorous, ever fresh, ever ever, ever ever through the long vista of ages, down through centuries of darkness and of light, was the only leader in the march of civilization, the only source from whence the learned of all ages and nations could drink in the knowledge of the truth which alone is free.

His words were not in vain, many and many a poor soul who had strayed away from the fold of his pastures, were enabled to return to their Shepherd and God by the Mission. Many who had not gone to the Holy Sacraments for years, were led through the week within the fold considerations which can be abundantly gained to those chances of grace.

But now our mission is over and we feel sad to think it was so short. Father Bouchard has gone in our mountain town, for already has he become that period when our Shepherd will come to pass into another life, and we know we will meet with the Good Shepherd, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant." Yes, he is now gone, but we may rightly convinced that the seed he planted would yield an abundant harvest under the fostering hand of our blessed Father, Father Lynch, whose every act and every word is for the good of his flock. His efforts are nobly seconded by Father Tuhman, whose indefatigable zeal has been employed in the cause of Holy Church for a quarter of a century, and Father Tuhman, the late arrival from the Green Isle.

COURTICE.

A GALA-DAY IN SANTA ROSA.

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR:

Dear Sir—The 30th of August, on which the Church celebrates Saint Rose of Lima, was celebrated this year in Santa Rosa with unusual devotion.

Solemn High Mass was announced for the day, but owing to the illness of Rev. J. Connery, the Pastor, and there being no assistant priests, the duties had to be resigned. Rev. Jos. Nat. S. J., who had lately promised to preach the panegyric of St. Rose, arrived the evening before, and, in spite of his feeble health, heard over a hundred confessions, and on St. Rose Day celebrated two Masses, the second being a High Mass.

Nevertheless, he ascended the pulpit, and, in a sweet and impressive manner, he spoke of the life of St. Rose, and again, in this country, he delivered a sermon, which will not be soon forgotten by the people of Santa Rosa. Another part of this Feast was the singing of Mr. Karl Forman, who electrified the people by his magnificent voice. The music was exceptional, as both he and Madame Forman assisted the choir.

Hon. Geo. K. B. Hayes addressed the men of the parish, for about three quarters of an hour, on the purposes and advantages of the Catholic Young Men's Societies throughout the country. Marked attention was given to his well-chosen and eloquent words, and he was applauded at the close of his address, which will prove many good the forty from joining. Nearly all present, of the reunion, and, as a result, the organization of a branch of the Young Men's Society, with a little exertion the organization will be successful here.

TUCSON, A. T., Aug. 29th, 1885.

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR:

Dear Sir—Yesterday, August 28th, being the Feast of the illustrious Saint Augustine, Patron of Tucson, was a holyday in the parish, and was celebrated with great solemnity in the Church bearing his name. There was a novena, during which the people prepared themselves for the reception of the holy Sacraments, and hundreds of them availed themselves of the opportunity, as there were eight visiting Fathers, who came to the assistance of the pastor, and are two priests in the Continental. First Mass commenced at half-past 5 o'clock, and attracted a great number of communicants, as were all the masses, which followed at intervals.

At half-past eight, Pontifical High Mass was celebrated by Bishop Bourgard, assisted by four priests. The music was the Mass in C minor, composed, rendered Mercadante's Mass in superior order. After the first Gospel, a panegyric on Saint Augustin, was delivered by Father Lassigny of the Society of Jesus, N. M. The crowded Pontifical Vespers was sung, and Benediction ended the ceremonies. The Sisters of Saint Joseph will open school on Sept. 1st.

SCHOOLS IN UTAH.

What Father Scanlan has Accomplished. St. Mary's Academy, Salt Lake City.

Every reader of the MONITOR will be pleased to see the rapid progress and flourishing condition of our schools in Utah. In that Territory, within the last ten years, Father Scanlan has succeeded in erecting four schools, four churches and two hospitals, and at present is engaged in building a Catholic College for young men, which will compare with any in the country, and is throwing buildings in the Territory. Much of these buildings, these institutions have come from small beginnings to vast proportions, that they are now the best patronized, and most popular institutions in the Territory.

We copy from the Salt Lake Tribune, the following flattering account of St. Mary's Academy in Salt Lake City:

A visit to St. Mary's Academy, this city, is always a delight, as the place, while near to the business hustle of man, has a pleasant air of retirement and a hospitable seclusion which makes one feel as if in another atmosphere from that of the rushing world. Just now a visit there is doubly pleasant, as the place is unusually attractive, if the new school rooms.

The final touches are being put to the thorough renovation of the buildings. They have been newly painted throughout, and overhauled on a military basis, so that now they are as fresh and healthily habitable as buildings can possibly be. The grounds are delightful; constant additions have been made to the shrubbery, and large numbers of new varieties of flowers have been obtained within the year, so that the grounds and their adornment, their summer-house and their playground are all another lovely.

The school-rooms are in fine order, many of them having received the finishing touches in a twenty and basement, the latter of stone, the upper wood of brick; dormitories, 12 in the basement are the boilers and steam apparatus for heating all the buildings, and in this are store-rooms. In the upper story is to be an art gallery, filled to accordingly to the best approved style, with light overhead and on three sides, fitted for such desired. The other part of that story is devoted to sleeping apartments, for the pupils, and a dormitory for the sick. Academy buildings by covered ventilation.

The school-rooms are in charge of the Sisters of Mercy, and their lives are given up to the noble work. They spare themselves not, but do it, and faithfully do their work, with the most gratifying results. They do not stop at simply their, but go on to think of what is possible, thus earning the respect and confidence of the parent, and the respect and love of the young taken given into their charge. It is pleasant to know that all these improvements are called for by the genuine growth of the school. As last year's attendance exceeded that of the year before, so the numbers who will attend this year will exceed those of last year. Every thing indicates a prosperous year. This teaching is thorough in all branches, being specially strong in those details which will come into practical use on leaving school. And while the pupil is made to do so, and not pampered, trained, the body is kept faithfully up by good food, plenty of exercise and pleasure. The boys' school is just north of the main school for young ladies. It is now entered by boys of 7 years, and a healthier, jollier, brighter lot of youngsters than are to be found there any day after the school begins, it would be impossible to see anywhere.

THE PLAGUES IN SPAIN.

A Doleful Picture of the Terrible Sufferings of our Spanish Brethren.

A letter from Osma, written by a religious to the Cross, describes the terrible condition of the plague-stricken at that region.

"The small town of Hospaldo, one of Soria, is desolation. Imagine to yourself a population of 700 inhabitants is very great indeed, 300 of whom are evidently seized with violent vomiting of blood, and out of this number 270 succumb in suddenly in a few hours. From the 17th to the 20th of July nearly half of the population disappeared before God. The morning following the 20th, at which the plague appeared, I was shocked at the door of three houses remaining, closed. On the 21st, I visited the house. He caused the door to be beat in; this time I saw a spectacle which I will not, I hope, see again. Three men, who had not left their beds, to make themselves heard or to receive the food which I had brought them, I found that they were dead in the night. The town is thronged with little children who have lost their parents, crying for bread and a home. The cure is dead; his place was not to be filled, and the cure, a boy, to all the cure, who was already sick, is not yet replaced, and I am sick.

"All the provinces are more or less invaded. Medina Sidonia, in Andalusia, is in great distress. Bonergal.—The Nationalists at East Dorgal held a convention, on Sunday, August 9, in the town of Tuam, in the county of Galway, which was attended by a large number of people, who were present fired. Letterkenny, Ballyhoey, Ballyshannon, Donegal, Ballybofey, Stranorlar, The Rev. Father Drummond, Adm., occupied the chair. The proceedings were of the most enthusiastic character, and were confined to reiterating the old and well-known sentiments of the Nationalists.

Dublin.—The West British offices in Sackville street, Dublin, which is turned to ashes, to prevent the street from being renamed O'Connell street, the name of the thoroughfare in the direction of Sharpley the people's wishes. The Lord Mayor, Alderman Harbinson and other members of the Corporation were served with a notice, signed by Commissioner Dillon, that unless, and without delay, a sufficient force of workmen, and servants, unless penalty of £1,000, shall be forthwith, with the effect any of the resolutions or reports in reference to the renaming of Sackville street, O'Connell street, and the Corporation of Dublin, the Commissioner will be compelled to take the necessary steps to protect the property of the Corporation, and the property of the people from the enemy and isolate itself for a long period. Such is our situation. Meanwhile, the people are paying with a hope that Heaven will spare us. Every evening streets are thronged, the cries of the poor, the sound kneeling, recites the rosary, sings litanies, listens to a sermon preached in the church, renews its supplications until an advanced hour of the night, and retires to rest with a calm resignation and a confidence in the Divine Mercy. Such, passion of the times, since the initiation by a petitioner one hundred years ago, and the interview therefrom through his Intercessor. May he deliver us still, for we are bowed to closely.

Our brethren go on well and have no fear. I have given notice to the corporation that in case it should come to pass that the Corporation of Dublin should be at the disposal of the sick in order to protect their religious, and, and that the Rev. Mr. Jones, and others more valiant, would be happy to offer themselves as guards to the homes of the Irish Nation and to protect the property of the people, the Sisters of Charity of Dublin are at the disposal of those of them are in readiness. Let all pray in Church for this unspeakable blessing, for, the first grace given we but trifling in comparison with all that it entitles us to, and, there is something sinister in the air and sky.

WHO PLANNED STEPHENS' escape

Thomas Emmett writes to an Eastern paper, as follows: "I have read with the greatest pleasure John Devoy's "A Page in Irish History," (which appeared in the Monitor last week) and I am glad to record in his graphic sketch of the escape of Stephens, that I was the man who first conceived the idea of the escape. I was the leader Underwood O'Connell, one of the Naturalization Bureau, New York City, to see the man referred to, November, 1865, a prisoner in Richmond Jail, Dublin, where the Fenians were confined, with Kickham, Brophy and Edward Duffy. Captain O'Connell was taken prisoner in the beginning of the war, and was a prisoner of war, and was exchanged, and was in the Bureau, and he was a prisoner, instructed to do the national cause would remain in this event of his brief sojourn. Mr. Brophy knew the secret, and, becoming fearfully impressed by the Captain's bearing, entered upon further interviews, and ultimately declared his intention of escaping, in disguised, seems to be would give him a letter of introduction to some of their friends outside. This act the Captain was only too glad to perform, and hence the successful issue of the perilous undertaking.

The "No Rent" Fleury in the Isle of Skye. NEW YORK, Sept. 3.—A subpœna to the Scotch Edinburgh says: A conference on the land question was held to-day at Portree, on the island of Skye. There were 100 delegates from all parts of Scotland present. McGregor of Ulinge was also in attendance. A number of serious orations were delivered, some of them in Gaelic. The speakers all advocated the doctrine of the Irish farmers, and the land-leaguers, and the land-reformers, and the land-leaguers, and the land-reformers, and the land-leaguers, and the land-reform

BY DUBOIS.

Low sank the sun behind the Cuba hills,
Leaving a mellow light on land and sea,
As I lose stranger from a distant shore
Passed up the storied wreck of grand Dunleary
In such a strain most poet-painter had Emotions waiting to his trembling lyre,
Pending then the sacred mound where long
Lagne the Bard and "Bard of the ships.

Spirit sweet that one o'er half the course earth,
And morning flushed along the eastern waves,
And the lone stranger from a foreign shore
In Cuba Pleasant knell o'er two new-made graves.
Chanting a De Profundis for the souls
Of home sacred remembrances and cheers,
Awaking 'till Gabriel's trumpet blast
Paula through the clouds and rolls from spheres to sphere.

When fast by Castle Dermod's ruined keep Nestles his native town secure from storm,
And the blue bay mirror's the darkling hills

MISSION OF THE CATHOLIC PRESS.

Journalism is the greatest social power, because it is the chief agent in propagating ideas, and ideas are the ideas constitute opinion, and opinion governs the world. In our view, religious journalism is not only a useful and serious occupation, but such a work, little inferior in importance to that of the ministry of sacred labors. What is said—who and by whom—in a Catholic journalism will be sanctioned and defined the world, whatever it may be—sacred, all, Divine truth.

Mullein Leaves in Consumption.

Dr. Quinlan, of Dublin, read before the International Medical Congress at Copenhagen last year an interesting paper on the medicinal qualities of the mullein. It has attracted widespread attention, and among the more recent articles confirmatory of Dr. Quinlan's statements are one by Dr. Willert, of Cincinnati, which appeared in the medical journals of last June, and that city. From the results obtained in 127 cases of pulmonary consumption treated by Dr. Quinlan with mullein alone, he draws the following conclusions, which are condensed from his original article, viz.

1. In the earlier and pretubercular stage of pulmonary consumption, mullein has a weight increasing and curative power greater than that of cod liver oil, and equal to that of Roman ichthyol.

2. In cases where tubercles are well established or cavities exist, the mullein has great power in relieving cough—a great boon to consumptives, whose weak stomachs too frequently cannot tolerate the usual cough remedies.

3. Phthisical diarrhœa is completely obviated by the mullein.

4. Mullein has no power or effect on the night sweats of consumption, which should be combated by atropia sulphate.

The method of using the mullein, which originated among the Irish peasantry, and was adopted by Dr. Quinlan just as he has got some dynamite to blow up stumps with, and they're sort o' green at the business.

Frightening the Little Ones.

With painful frequency we hear of cruel "practical jokes" perpetrated upon little "sensitive souls" by grown people. The old story of a child frightened into convulsions by a playfellow who "only wanted to have a little fun." One would think that incidents like this had been enacted and told with ghastly iteration often enough from generation to generation to warn of the most incorrible fun-lovers and fools from the perilous ground.

The progress of the willow plot is generally the same up to a certain point. There is neither originality nor variety in the favorite mode of execution. It sounds trite in the telling. A figure wrapped in the conventional sheet, lurking in a dark corner; a spring upon the unsuspected victim, assisted because he is the most timorous or delicate of the family or school; dismay, shrieks of anguish bent with goblin laughter—then a difference in the ending. Sometimes no serious harm is done, unless that one child is made more timid, another more cruel. Again, the nervous system is unbalanced so far that a swoon, or, as in the case before us, convulsions ensue. Once in a while the innocent subject of the practical joke pays for his tormentor's prank with his reason or his life.

In a less flagrant manner incalculable mischief is done in many a nursery by tales of ghosts, bogies, the black man who comes down the chimney to catch children who will not go to sleep quietly, etc. That mother is culpable who, when she finds her child unduly timid does not watch for indications that the nervous organism of her offspring has been tampered with, and who, should her suspicions be confirmed, does not follow the clue to the source and banish the criminal from her household.

The Religious Home.

From the home nursery, the incense of prayer should ascend as a most sweet morning and evening sacrifice to the Lord.

In such families we seem to find proofs of the special benediction of heaven.

Faith, religion and virtue are thus fastened to inveterate growth, and final perseverance almost assured. We earnestly exhort all parents to this salutary custom.

And if it be not always feasible in the morning, at least every evening, at a fixed hour, let the entire family be assembled for night prayers, followed by a short reading from the Holy Scriptures, The Following of Christ, or some other pious book.

Family Fun.

Green at the Business.

We first came upon a young farmer, says a Michigan traveller, afoot and in somewhat of a hurry. Two or three of the fingers of his right hand were badly abused, and he had not stopped long enough to unwrap the hand in a rag. He said something about "three miles and a doctor."

Driving along for about half a mile we came upon a dead mule in harness, with a great splinter driven through him. There was a boy about 12 years of age seated on a pile of rails near by, but he was wiping blood of his head and didn't seem to hear our questions. Half a mile beyond this was a log cabin. One side was bulged in, the windows shattered, and the door in shifting wood. There was a deal of dog and four or five chickens between the door and the gate.

"Hallooo! the house!" called the colonel, as we halted at the gate.

After a long minute a woman came out. She had several loose teeth, which were bleeding, and she had the brightest lick of a schoolmarm treed by a bear.

"Been a cyclone here" asked the colonel.

"Yes."

"Somebody shooting?"

"No."

"Can't be a political meeting?"

"No."

"Well, what in Halifax is the row, then?

"Nothin,' 'cept the old man and the hogs has got some dynamite to blow up stumps with, and they're sort o' green at the business.

THE DIGNITY OF LABOR.

travelled. Why, then, are the unhappiest of mankind? Why are the miserable makers? Who are the most miserable? They are those who give themselves up unconditionally to idleness. It is pitiable to behold them. When I was training young men in every class of life for their future, I invariably insisted—no matter whether the boy was the son of a peer or a peasant—that he should be instructed to a knowledge of the laws of labor, for such knowledge constitutes in it the elements which constitute joy and happiness on earth. So that if I were called upon to give a definition of a happy man, I should delineate in it, as its fundamental element, he who has learned to love Labor and to see the dignity of it.

The position, ladies and gentlemen, taken by Jesus Christ His self, in coming to found the Christian religion, forms a most striking and beautiful illustration of my subject, and is indeed a grand standpoint from which we might start. In the first place, while our Lord was yet unborn, He possessed the knowledge of all men and of all the angels. There is not knowledge that has been ever yet known on earth; there is no knowledge that ever will be—but that our Blessed Lord was not possessed of from the very moment that He was a helpless babe in the arms of His Blessed Mother. He was flooded with genius and knowledge.

When man speak of education, and of the vast expansion of the human mind, I reflect and ask myself: Do these man really see the difference between a man of genius and a man of study? It appears to me there is about the same difference between the two that there is between a man on crutches and a man having the use of his own legs. The man of genius argues not, but rushes or springs to a conclusion at once, and you find him his mind is made before has time. Genius, then, consists of being able to come to conclusions without using artificial means. Now, our Blessed Lord was a man of genius. It was not by argument that He obtained His knowledge. It arose from the union of Divine Nature with human nature. He came into this world flooded with knowledge, and in the words of St. Paul "annointed through and through with the Divinity."

Now, I should like to know if I were to ask any young American—Now, young man, you have a certain thing to accomplish, how are you to go about accomplishing that thing? If I said go into that garden, take a spade and dig out some potatoes, take and gather me some cabbages, or pluck some fruit off yonder trees and by your order work aside. Don't you think he would look at me with supreme contempt? And of course he would look still more contemptuously at me since I came from a foreign country. But it is not his contempt for me, but for the labor I should ask him to perform. But Our Blessed Lord possessed all this knowledge before He had spent three and a half years on earth, and during the remainder of His life on earth He spent His time in

THE SANCTIFICATION OF LABOR.

Living with His parents, working with His foster father in the double work that was included in the meaning of the technical word "carpenter," which combined the double business of blacksmith and carpenter in word. And during eighteen years of His life He labored at and sanctified the labor by which man is able to earn his bread. Now, for the benefit of hard fists and ruminate not upon them, that they do not profane any effect. Remember, how, that Holy Child, well, most of all, that toiled in Nazareth with the chisel and the hammer. And what was all this work then for? To the old story: It was to give sacredness and dignity to that very labor which was looked at by some as a curse. And, indeed, it is impossible to be brought face to face with that fact with an being over whelmed with contempt.

It is not surprising, therefore, under such circumstances that the Catholic Church and her ministers should from the very earliest days, take the same view of labor as exemplied by our Blessed Lord Himself and those who surrounded Him. For instance, when we look at the great number of Religious Orders in the Catholic Church; they are one and all laborers; the great characteristic of their lives has been their great love of manual labor. The great and Holy Father of the Desert spent a great part of their days in tilling the soil, or in making wicker work, or in doing such other material labor as would benefit themselves and their fellow-creatures. And in the night they spent a great part of the time in prayer, binding therein strength and power for the fulfilment of their manual labor. And go to whatever their monasteries have been established and you will see perhaps what once was barren desert now a perfect and beautiful garden, productive of everything for the maintenance of man. There you will see those good men working—not to obtain their daily bread—but that they desire to exactly what Christ did and sanctified by the eighteen years He labored on this earth. Look, for instance, at now near one of the great bustling centres of Scotland. Why, look how holy men have labored and made it a perfect paradise. In this country, too, are the labor performed by the monks in the vicinity of Pittsburg. They have one of the most beautiful gardens produced by their toil that is to be found in that country. And what I have to say of those few orders, I have to say of all Orders; they have labored because labor is sanctified. Even the great Apostle St. Paul—having been taught in his early days the art of tent-making—not laid aside on pursuing that work in his latest years.

But why turn anywhere for an example of the dignity or sanctity of labor, when we have it so near us! The story of San Francisco has been in part written, but there is a great deal more to be said and written. What can exceed the story of the Franciscan Fathers who left the home of their childhood to their beloved Spain, at a time when they knew they would never see say more the parents that gave them life nor the friends of their youth. They settled down here with their great big, broad Spanish hearts and faith. They might after and wanted no reservations, no lands, no wealth to support them; no soldiers to protect them. No, they came to labor for themselves and their fellow creatures and speak of their labor, their home and churches as rude if you will, but there is yet a great moral in their work. They imparted to the Indians a knowledge of the law of labor and the law of prayer. They worked with the Indians hand in hand and founded a number of monasteries, which were not only the centers of education, but which imparted to the savage a good knowledge of that practical skill which enabled him to become a useful member of society. Wherever, therefore, the Church has been permitted to exercise her labors fully, she has planted her monasteries, teaching her children the laws of labor, and that labor—which began with a curse—should be regarded as a blessing.

Again, ladies and gentlemen, you cannot be ignorant of the neatness and beauty of Japanese art, and yet that knowledge of the law of labor and that taste which is characteristic of the Japanese, has to bear its date from the time that St. Francis Xavier planted the Cross of Christ in that land.

THERE IS ANOTHER POINT

which becomes extremely practical in the consideration of this subject of labor. Its circumstances enabled me while travelling to meet a distinguished and honorable banker, a man received both here and in Europe in Washington, and he requested me to accompany him, on an anniversary of Jefferson, to visit a number of children at the public schools. It was indeed a surprise visit for me. Among the children I found myself called upon to speak, and I spoke upon a portrait of Jefferson before me, and a number of mottoes placed at the side of it. I turned to the female portion of my audience and said: "Children, if I am rightfully informed, your education has been at the expense of the State. The Starring and training that you have received has been made up of the public funds. Therefore, as it has been drawn from the public, naturally you belong to that public which gives life to the nation. May I then be permitted to ask how many of you are going to be housemaids! How many of you are going to be ladies made? How many of you are going to be cooks?"

The scene that followed was rather strikes. Indeed I would be amusing if it were not so painful. I can only describe the effect as appearing like one of those extraordinary scants where a bombshell is thrown amongst a number of people. They looked at me in wonder; their little mouths with open; and it appeared as though I were in danger of being swallowed clean down. And suddenly on recovering from the effect of these questions, there was a universal shout of laughter.

I then turned my attention to the male portion of my audience, and said to them: "Now, you are the young blood of the nation, and it may become your duty to dig up the soil and assist in the raising of bricks and the carrying of mortar; and it may be permitted to some of you to rise in the world and be a man of study! It appears to me there is about the same difference between the two that there is between a man on crutches and a man having the use of his own legs. The man of genius argues not, but rushes or springs to a conclusion at once, and you find him his mind is made before has time. Genius, then, consists of being able to come to conclusions without using artificial means. Now, our Blessed Lord was a man of genius. It was not by argument that He obtained His knowledge. It arose from the union of Divine Nature with human nature. He came into this world flooded with knowledge, and in the words of St. Paul "annointed through and through with the Divinity."

Now, I should like to know if I were to ask any young American—Now, young man, you have a certain thing to accomplish, how are you to go about accomplishing that thing? If I said go into that garden, take a spade and dig me some potatoes, take and gather me some cabbages, or pluck some fruit off yonder trees and by your order work aside. Don't you think he would look at me with supreme contempt? And of course he would look still more contemptuously at me since I came from a foreign country. But it is not his contempt for me, but for the labor I should ask him to perform. But Our Blessed Lord possessed all this knowledge before He had spent three and a half years on earth, and during the remainder of His life on earth He spent His time in

THE SANCTIFICATION OF LABOR.

Living with His parents, working with His foster father in the double work that was included in the meaning of the technical word "carpenter," which combined the double business of blacksmith and carpenter in word. And during eighteen years of His life He labored at and sanctified the labor by which man is able to earn his bread. Now, for the benefit of hard fists and ruminate not upon them, that they do not profane any effect. Remember, how, that Holy Child, well, most of all, that toiled in Nazareth with the chisel and the hammer. And what was all this work then for? To the old story: It was to give sacredness and dignity to that very labor which was looked at by some as a curse. And, indeed, it is impossible to be brought face to face with that fact with an being overwhelmed with contempt.

It is not surprising, therefore, under such circumstances that the Catholic Church and her ministers should from the very earliest days, take the same view of labor as exemplied by our Blessed Lord Himself and those who surrounded Him. For instance, when we look at the great number of Religious Orders in the Catholic Church; they are one and all laborers; the great characteristic of their lives has been their great love of manual labor. The great and Holy Father of the Desert spent a great part of their days in tilling the soil, or in making wicker work, or in doing such other material labor as would benefit themselves and their fellow-creatures. And in the night they spent a great part of the time in prayer, binding therein strength and power for the fulfilment of their manual labor. And go to whatever their monasteries have been established and you will see perhaps what once was barren desert now a perfect and beautiful garden, productive of everything for the maintenance of man. There you will see those good men working—not to obtain their daily bread—but that they desire to exactly what Christ did and sanctified by the eighteen years He labored on this earth. Look, for instance, at now near one of the great bustling centres of Scotland. Why, look how holy men have labored and made it a perfect paradise. In this country, too, are the labor performed by the monks in the vicinity of Pittsburg. They have one of the most beautiful gardens produced by their toil that is to be found in that country. And what I have to say of those few orders, I have to say of all Orders; they have labored because labor is sanctified. Even the great Apostle St. Paul—having been taught in his early days the art of tent-making—not laid aside on pursuing that work in his latest years.

But why turn anywhere for an example of the dignity or sanctity of labor, when we have it so near us! The story of San Francisco has been in part written, but there is a great deal more to be said and written. What can exceed the story of the Franciscan Fathers who left the home of their childhood to their beloved Spain, at a time when they knew they would never see say more the parents that gave them life nor the friends of their youth. They settled down here with their great big, broad Spanish hearts and faith. They might after and wanted no reservations, no lands, no wealth to support them; no soldiers to protect them. No, they came to labor for themselves and their fellow creatures and speak of their labor, their home and churches as rude if you will, but there is yet a great moral in their work. They imparted to the Indians a knowledge of the law of labor and the law of prayer. They worked with the Indians hand in hand and founded a number of monasteries, which were not only the centers of education, but which imparted to the savage a good knowledge of that practical skill which enabled him to become a useful member of society. Wherever, therefore, the Church has been permitted to exercise her labors fully, she has planted her monasteries, teaching her children the laws of labor, and that labor—which began with a curse—should be regarded as a blessing.

TO CHARLES STEWART PARNELL.

To thee, O poet and gifted one
Poor suffering Erin turns
For in thy noble, generous heart
The fame of Freedom burns.

Though many weary years have fed
Since tyranny despotic
Poor Meagher and his gallant few
Took part in an epoch.

The hope still lives and many hearts
Are yearning for a brighter
Day than dawned "Ninety-Eight"
Ere tyrant despotic were living.

The spirit of that little band
Who dared by bolder measures,
The shackles of their native land
With trembling sword to sever

The spirit of that noble band
Who "dared" to do or perishing
And now will Ireland pay the debt
Which she so long is owing

Poor Emmet on the scaffold felt
Ere yet his soul departed,
Told of the suffering long endured
By the broken-hearted.

Was he have so oft instilled
Into his sons in prison,
With love—devotion—truth.

The spirit now of many a son
To tyranny a martyr,
Looks down, with pride on brave Parnell
Who Ireland's rights won't barter.

To him we hope in accent low
Far wisdom's at the helm,
And Ireland's prosperity through will soon
Her enemies o'ewhelm.

O, let us hope and let us pray,
Which we long desiderate,
Will again obstruct the path
To Ireland's wished for fate.

Her generous sons the world o'er
Ready are and willing
To aid our leader in the cause—
The mission he's fulfilling.

From this from land her exiled sons,
Proud Erin's heart is thrilling,
And yearning for her native land
The over on hope regaling.

Sail on! sail on! O, noble craft!
Brave Parnell, in steering,
While DAVITT, BRADY and the rest,
To Ireland so endearing

Are at the bow, danger to note
And give timely warning
Of the lurk and shoals ahead,
Erin must be storming.

CHARITY.

(Written after hearing a sermon preached on that subject by Rev. Father Scanlan, Feb. 8, 1880.)

Beautiful virtue, sent from above,
Sweetest emblem of God's perfect love,
Do I possess you? do I dwell in
Your sacred temple, and God's bitter pain?
Do I hasten to succor my brother in need?
Even for those who have done me a harm?
Do I forgive as I would be forgiven?
Thus binding spoken to bequeathed in Heaven?
The answer comes, would God I could say—"Oh not here hath a
Only our Father that gift can bestow.
I've long truly that blessing to share,
Kneel as He bestowed and ask it in prayer.
Ask Him to touch my cold, flinty stony drum,
That beautiful lesson He taught from the Cross—
That lesson of Charity grand and sublime
That through endless ages untarnished shall shine.
If robes and mansions and purple are thine,
If you give but the crumbs from your table to
Your brother, and the rich, then all is for naught,
Not a single mite, or good for your soul shall Be gained.
That vision of charity on each day after day,
Not intercede and case the chosen in the way;
Look not for this poison the world may bestow,
But do all for Him who has sent you below;
Look out Him your cross in want and in sin,
Help them, and do it for the love you bear Him,
Your Who's labor will not be a loss.
Then look for the crown that replaces the cross.

"ROCK MONOT!"

(SECOND EDITION, REWRITTEN BY THE AUTHOR.)

The following beautiful lines were written during Father Monot's pastorate in Virginia City, by the Rev. and Venerable Commendator, Father Ildephonsus A. Lod, of Gethsemane, Ky., and were published in the Monitor, Sept. 27, 1879, and it is to be hoped they will be re-printed, Sept. Fri. Tue. 1880, and in some quantity, in this issue. The poem was written by the best authority of Kentucky, from Maryland, and the nearly 100 years Father Monot's Father has been the work of the Monastery of Gethsemane, Nelson Co., Ky., and still is, from the Rock Monot, in Nature at Calvary!

Behold how He Who reigns on high,
Immortal King of kings,
Comes meekly down to life and die,
And life to mortals brings!
Behold how He, Who rules the earth,
Who sets in Him their treasure,
Who prevents Him from His birth,
And someone Him to death!
Who make His royalty a sham,
Wilfut equal to the shame,
And feeble as the meanest lamb,
Hinself Him lose and sent.
Behold His tattered royal robe,
And thorny diadem,
Imposed by mockery, while His brows,
And pops and blood for them!
If man his cement love can show,
By dying for his friend,
Or love unmerited, when no love
Is returned to the end,
Yet Heart Divine drew closer still,
And sensitive methods plan,
Even beyond all sensitive to fill
With love, to please and dim.
Behold how Heart Divine, Christ Christ
Love severe flesh and blood,
And, immolated on the cross,
Gives both to be our food
And, by consecration, also soul,
Its spotless both or clay,
Or parts as well as in the whole,
And that Most, God the Son,
Yet Divine, Man, Man, Man, Sentient
To Divinity lent to shown
For man, who, heedless, God and blind,
Full basis to endure you,
The Father sends on from on high,
To receive His sacrifice
He owns Dear Son to blood and die,
A victim on the Cross;
The Son with equal love, consents
To do His Father's will,
And by submit of pangs, prevents
Our everlasting ill;
The Holy Ghost would fain reveal
His love to mortal man,
Who so disregarded, yet not let
Put Unit, and unity of equals plead
In vain with souls defiled,
Who loving sin, refuses to heed
By Satan's chosen hospital;
Of all heaven and earth show deep concern
For their true happiness,
Who unremembered, left to learn
The way to endless bliss.
Oh, I would all men from this abiale,
Such pardon for their guilt,
And such amazing condescension
By blood on Calvary spilt,
Would make them tremble at destiny,
Sought such mother's milk,
And make him drink of life to joy,
From his sacred Saviour's side,
If fickle friend, with perverse will,
Retrieve his sinful trace
Unsuspected Mercy follows still,
To win or drive back,
That Christ, the King, who him may reign,
And on and heavenly joy,
Till he arrives at glory gain,
And eternally rest.

WEDDING BELLS.

Evelson and Harold Deane were married the following spring. Harold proposed they should spend their honeymoon in Switzerland; but Mr. Darcy suggested Sorrento. His son-in-law at once bowed to this decision, although when alone a moment afterwards he blased through his set teeth, "Confound the old fool! with his d—d cant of patriotism. Well, we go to the Lake to enjoy a continual shower-bath; and the odds are a hundred to one against in ever getting a glimpse of the top of Ben Ion." But as if to give the lie to this cynical slander, the weather was on the best behavior during their sojourn at the Lakes.

"Well, this is—is—is—is—is—" stuttering at breakfast; "but I shall never rail against it again since it has been propitious on this occasion, and thus enabled my darling to enjoy the many beauties of this wonderously beautiful spot."

"Oh, Harold, you do not know how much I have enjoyed this glorious scenery, as you have shown it to me, yourself."

"Yes, in the pleasure reflected in those sparkling eyes, my Evelson. I know you are a genuine lover of nature in all its varying moods. I know you love fresh air, and meadows and green fields. I have marked the glow of pleasure which flushed your cheek as you inhaled the fragrance of yon pine princess. I have watched you absorbed in contemplation of a patch of leaden-colored clouds on the background of a wintry sky, and gaze delighted in the early morning on the thin column of smoke that so gracefully curled over the green sime from the chimney of a mud-wattlebe, we have heard. The over on hope regaling."

PASTORAL LETTER

—OF—

RIGHT REV. BISHOP MANOGUE,

—TO THE—

Clergy of the Diocese of Grass Valley.

REVERENDS AND DEAR FATHERS OF THE CLERGY:

My Pastoral just received, the October devotion of last and the year before are also prescribed for this, and future years, as long as the evils which beset the Church and civil society remain, and until the freedom and independence of the Vicar of Christ be restored. These daily devotions commence the first day of October and continue till the second of November, inclusive, the Feast of the Rosary, followed by the Litany of the Blessed Virgin, are the prayers prescribed. These may be said immediately before or after Mass, or, should the afternoon be more convenient, the devotional exercises should be accompanied by the Benediction of the Most Blessed Sacrament.

Each time these exercises are publicly, or, for a legitimate cause, privately performed, and offered for and with the intention of our Holy Father, an indulgence of seven years and seven quarantines is imparted.

During the time appointed, if plenary indulgence is granted to the faithful at the times and in the public devotions, or, for sufficient reason, privately perform them, provided also they worthily approach and receive the sacrament of penance and fortify themselves with the adorable Eucharist.

A plenary indulgence is also imparted to all who on the solemn feast of the Holy Rosary, or any day within the octave, shall worthily receive the sacraments mentioned, and in any church, chapel or oratory supplicate for the exaltation of Our and the intercession of the Blessed Virgin according to the intention of Christ's Vicar on Earth.

Our Most Holy Father, in consideration of the sudden and more serious cases of rural inhabitants unable to observe the above prescriptions during the month of October, has graciously accorded to them the same privileges and grace on performing the same exercises the following November or even December. This privilege, however, should be accompanied by the advice and approbation of the respective pastors.

Yes are, therefore, Beloved Brethren, earnestly entreated to humbly, fervently and prominently lay before your congregations these solemn injunctions of our supreme Pontiff and Pastor. No occasion or opportunity should be allowed to pass without making known the solicitude of the common Father of the faithful for his children. The hope of the sacred Rosary, shouting in colestial grams and heavenly benedictions, are in his hands, while the maternal heart of the Church is palpitating with sentiments of love, tenderness and compassion, and herself, the chaste spouse of Jesus, most anxious to see her choicest blessings upon her dear children redeemed by Christ and purchased by Blood.

Yes are already aware that Rosary Sunday has for third season in the Church been set apart as Holy Father. Agree, full and effective announcement of this should be made next Sunday, and particular pains taken to have the contribution worthy of the illustrious object for which they are intended and intended. We also desire and earnestly recommend that the Peter's Pence Box be prominently placed in the church and particular attention directed thereto during the devotions of this month of October, so that the private offerings of the faithful during that month, united with the public collection of Rosary Sunday, may show forth your love and as well as the generosity of your people towards the Imperial Pontiff. These collections are expected from every church and mission of the diocese, and indeed let in Grass Valley by the 15th of November.

Before finishing let me also notify you that the usual ecclesiastical retreat for October is, for particular reasons, deferred to next year.

+P. MANOGUE,
Bishop of Grass Valley.

Aids to Christian Perfection.

It is sad to visit the homes of Catholics and to find therein no sign of the Faith they ought to profess before the whole world. It is not by profession to be Christian that we can make our Faith pleasing to God, but we must also make that Faith practical in every action of our lives, both in our public life and in our domestic circle. The home of every Catholic family should be ornamented with Catholic pictures calculated to inspire devotion in the hearts of all who dwell therein as well as to remain a love for the religious profession they represent in the minds of every visitor. No Catholic bed room should be devoid of a Crucifix, or a statue of the Sacred Heart, a picture of the Blessed Virgin, and other holy subjects which will prove incentives to devotion in those who sleep therein, reminding them every morning and night of their duty towards God and their reliance upon the protection of the good office of the "Refuge of Sinners" and the saints who dwell with God in Heaven.

Catholic books and papers form another feature which should also be prominent in every Catholic home, as they are conducive to a love for good reading in the minds of all who peruse them, and the silent influence they exercise upon the minds of Catholic youth is of inestimable benefit to them in after life. In this way Catholic books and Catholic papers help Catholic parents in the work of raising up their children to love God, to venerate the Blessed Virgin, and to imitate the saints, and thus lead their minds away from that fetid pool of immoral literature which is daily destroying all faith and morality in the minds of millions of young men and women in America.

Catholic books, pictures and newspapers are now so cheap that even the poorest can procure them by practicing a little economy, and when once their beneficial influence is felt upon the members of a family, it will be found that the money expended in their purchase is the best investment that can be made for the good of the souls of those who glory in belonging to the true Church of God.

Dr. Willey's Calumny against Catholic Missionaries in Oregon.

In a recent issue of the organ of the Congregationalists in this city, Dr. S. H. Willey undertakes to give a history of the Whitman Indian Massacre which occurred in Oregon in 1847. The long winded article is mainly intended to calumniate certain Catholic priests there in Eastern Oregon, changing them with inciting the Cayuse Indians to commit the crime of murdering a Presbyterian missionary and some other persons then residing with the Presbyterian missionaries among the Cayuse Indians. In this aspersing the character of the early Catholic missionaries in Oregon, Dr. Willey is merely playing a kind of second-fiddle to a fanatical preacher in Oregon named Griffin who in "Grammar Sauslee" in consequence of the manner in which he "smashes" the English language to please in all his peculiarly anti-Catholic diatribes against everything "Papish." The "author" from whom Dr. Willey gets his hatchet-sharpening material—another pious fraud to start every spot on all themes touching on the Catholic Church. No impartial reader can peruse this compound of falsehoods, his city and bad grammar, yelped "The History of Oregon," and not become convinced that the writer thereof was the most malicious falsifier and the most malignant calumniator of the Catholic Church and her priests that ever spelled "Jesuits" with a big "G."

Dr. Willey being a bird of the same brood of anti-Catholic cranks as the poor old Oregon dotard, naturally believes all the trumped-up tales which Grey the Grammar Smasher has invented out of the fertile fields of his imagination which for more than forty years has been fed upon the most inflamable lucubrations that the Father of Lies could raise to red-hot heat. And these falsehoods Dr. Willey quotes solely because they tend to blacken the character of certain priests of the Catholic Church. As for the full charges themselves, Dr. Willey knows no more about them than he does about the true gospel of Christ. All his mis-information comes second-hand, and yet this ignorance has lead this "preacher" to publish to the world that the Catholic priests in Oregon in 1847 were responsible for the murder of Dr. Whitman and others at the hands of the Cayuse Indians!

Calumny more business, or bigotry more fanatical never served the soul of a graveyard ghoul!

For a third of a century we have been familiar with all the facts pertaining to the Whitman Massacre. We knew the two Apostolic missionaries—Right Rev. A. M. Blanchet and Very Rev. J. B. Brouillet—against whom the rancor of religious hate has been hurled by a few male and female fanatics. And, with this evidence before us, with this experience to guide us, we can candidly declare that there is not the small est shadow of truth in any charge made against those holy confessors of the Catholic Church by the unlettered Grey or his gospel satellite the enouciated Willey.

All the facts prove that the life of Dr. Whitman had been threatened by the Cayuse Indians long before the arrival of the calumniated Catholic priests in Eastern Oregon. Dr. Whitman was—like all Protestant preachers—a strict believer in ordained Calvinist, who attempted to establish a sort of Cromwellian rule over the Cayuse Indians. And that rule had to be raised up among the tribe on enemy that could only be satisfied with his death. The Indians saw their lands taken from them without compensation, they saw their children and kindred die by hundreds under the treatment of the American "Medicine Man"—for Dr. Whitman treated their fever fakers which proved fearfully fatal—and even as early as 1843 the Cayuse Indians were so incensed against Dr. Whitman that they broke into his house during his absence in the dead of night and tried to murder Mrs. Whitman. This fact is furnished by a Methodist preacher whose "History of Oregon" is familiar doubtless to Dr. Willey. And this very evident sign of Indian hostility to Dr. Whitman occurred four years previous to the arrival of Bishop Blanchet, Father Brouillet and other Catholic missionaries in Oregon.

Not only the Cayuses, but all the other Indian tribes, became so enraged against the whites for what they called "stealing their lands" as early as 1842, that they united for the purpose of waging war against the settlers. But what led immediately to the murder of Dr. Whitman was the fact that he was the physician who attended the wife of Tamahas (the murderer who killed Dr. Whitman), and the died—like many others of her tribe—from his treatment. "A life for a life" is the Indian law, hence Tamahas murdered Dr. Whitman because he imagined that the Doctor purposely killed his squaw.

It must be borne also in mind that among all the Indians concerned in this catastrophe not one of them was a Catholic; they nearly all belonging immediately to the Presbyterian sect, and their early enmity—allied with their Calvinistic Christianity, is then set forth by correspondence of the Oregon American, published by a Presbyterian preacher named Griffin in Oregon, back in the "forties"!

"The Cayuse had become a praying people. In almost every lodge the family altar was erected. Worship was morning and evening. Their morals underwent a complete change. Their marriage relations were purified, while the dead bodies of the male lay scattered the foot of the lowlands of heaven and the bones of the female lay in the potter's field, yet there some was a member of our church, and while he held one of the surplices as he strip, the corpse his brutal passions, he was careful to have morning and evening prayer, and to read a portion of the scripture from Ki book which we printed while he was in our school at Clear Water."

Dr. Willey alludes to the way Mr. Spaulding—another Protestant missionary—acted his life, but the fact has been established that only for Father Brouillet the Indian who followed Mr. Spaulding would have murdered him. Father Brouillet risked his own life in order to save Mr. Spaulding's, but the only return he received from that renowned preacher was despoiled calumny unworthy even a Calvinist.

From a mass of evidence easily produced a can unanswerably substantiate every statement we make upon this matter, and prove to the satisfaction of all impartial people, that neither Bishop Blanchet or any priest under him, had hand, act or thought in the slain massacre of the members of the Presbyterian Mission in Oregon in 1847.

Catholic missionaries had just arrived in the country, and never had any intercourse with the Cayuse Indians under charge of Dr. Whitman. The Catholic missionary operations were just begun among the tribe of Umatilla Indians, at a distance of twenty five miles from Dr. Whitman's station, and not one of the Umatilla Indians was concerned in the murder. Some of the Cayuse Indians—incensed and disgusted at Dr. Whitman's treatment of them—wanted him to leave his mission so that the "Black Gowns" could instruct them. But Bishop Blanchet peremptorily refused such interference with Dr. Whitman. Thus it is easily comprehended that the Catholic missionaries could in no possible way have suggested, connived at or encouraged the Whitman Massacre, even leaving out of view entirely the exalted Christian character of these Apostolic men—one of whom died in Washington territory, and is universally venerated for his many virtues, and the other of whom was a prince of the Diocese of Nesqualy up to a couple of years ago, when he died at his post as head of the Catholic Indian Bureau in Washington City.

Dr. Willey—in his second hand account of this massacre copied from Grey the Grammar Smasher—out-Grays Grey even in falsehood when he makes this statement, which he doubtless invented in order to injure Catholic priests in the eyes of his readers:

But, added to this natural tendency on the part of the Indians, was the active influence of the Roman Catholic priests. On this point all accounts agree. For years they had sought to undermine the confidence of the Indians in our missionaries."

This aspersion is as unwarrantable as it is untrue. The so-called "active influence of the Catholic priests" is purely a mythical imagination of Dr. Willey's mind, infamed with bitter spleen against Catholic. "For years" he says, "the priests had sought to undermine the confidence of the Indians in our missionaries." How false these two assertions are may be easily surmised when we tell our readers that Bishop Blanchet and Father Brouillet arrived at Fort Walla Walla September 5th, 1847, and remained there until November 29th of the same year, the murder of Dr. Whitman and others having occurred on the 29th of November, 1847, hence the charge that they ever had the slightest intimation that such a barbarous murder was contemplated by the Cayuse Indians, could only emanate from civil-disposed cranks whom it is charity to suppose were half crazy through their inordinate hatred of the Catholic Church.

In alluding to what Dr. Willey falsely calls "the active influence of the Catholic priests" among the Indians, Dr. Willey says "on this point all accounts agree," thereby trying to impress upon the minds of his readers who may be ignorant of the real facts in the case, that all writers are in accord with the Vicious view taken by Grey, Spaulding, Willey & Co. Here, too, Catholic truth is able to triumph over trumped-up falsehood, as we have in our possession the evidence of such men of undisputed reputation as Sir James Douglas, Chief Factor of the Hudson Bay Company; Rev. Cushawa Blanc, Methodist missionary in Oregon; Hon. Elijah White, Sub-Indian Agent in Oregon; Hon Peter H. Burnett, who resided in Oregon at the time, and who is familiar with all the facts in the case; Joel Palmer, then Indian Agent in Oregon; Very Rev. J. B. Brouillet, who buried the bodies of the murdered victims, saved the lives of the women and children at Dr. Whitman's station, and also saved at the risk of his own life—the life of the fiblelous ingrate H. H. Spaulding. Rt. Rev. A. M. Blanchet, whose holy life has been providentially prolonged in order to be able to give oral evidence, if necessary, against the wanton falsehoods of Dr. Willey.

Not one of the illustrious gentlemen whose names we have quoted, endorse Dr. Willey's second hand slanderous bash. And—added to this array of truthful gentlemen—we possess documentary proof on every point connected with this vexed question which fully repudiates the slightest insinuation even of half-read sectarians, who are at present trying to stir up strife upon a question that has long since been settled and satisfied by the law of the land. Dr. Willey, therefore, had better try his pyrotechnics on some other subject more suitable to his limited knowledge and his innate bigotry, than to touch upon a question regarding which he has to rely altogether upon that broken reed seen among ranters—Grey the Grammar Smasher.

—A friend sends us an article entitled "Freed by Adversity" which he clipped from the Union Pacific, and wants us to "say something about it." But the game is not worth the pouder, as the article is a compilation of Congregational cant and old fossilized falsehoods that have been ground to powder by the Catholic press a thousand times. A writer who is so bad as retailing such lies about Copernicus and Galelio, only shows that he is still wallowing in the mire of prejudice which his Puritanical predecessors piled up for him. It is now admitted by all impartial scholarly writers whose opinions are worth having, that the Catholic Church was never opposed to science, nor did she persecute Copernicus or Galelio for their scientific opinions. But there is a class of half-read "Professors" in the world whose backwoods training has left them at the tail end of their class, and these men believe now—and always will cling to the same opinion—that the Catholic Church is to be held accountable for the deluge; that she should be held responsible for every if that human flesh is heir to; and that her only use in the world is to be made a target for the scribblers among the pests to shoot at. In this sense the "Professor's" powder is damp; his pepper-box has been prematurely discharged, and the result is very likely to last somebody among those who are tinkering at a false theology in a certain Oakland seminary.

Very Rev. M. A. Hunt, Chancellor of the Diocese of Hartford, Conn., who has recently been visiting Rome, is the bearer of the Pallium to Archbishop Throe of Trinidad Archbishop Salpointe of Santa Fe, Father Hunt will return to the United States this present month.

Anglo-American Enemies of Ireland's Freedom.

The usar prospect of the disenfranchisement of the Irish people from their long endured slavery at the hands of England, ought to be a source of gratitude and national joy to every citizen of this Republic. Ireland's freedom's battle flag was planted through Irish valor and Catholic courage. Every American citizen ought to delight in knowing that Freedom was spreading throughout the world, and that the principles of self-government were receiving recognition even in lands where Monarchy is the ruling power. But, alas! for the spirit of pro-British bigotry which is shrewd, we find among those who call themselves Christians, that slavish spirit of sectarian malice which makes them thank God that Ireland is still treated with injustice by England, and to hope that the day will never come when Liberty will be the presiding genius in the Green Island of Saints.

One of that class of unchristian cranks given vent to his vicious anti-Catholic spleen in last week's Pacific, wherein this sectarian plaited English American condescendingly informs his readers that in his Herculean efforts to keep abreast of the world in its daily occurrences, he—the great Czar of Congregationalism—"has to read now and then about Mr. Parnell and Ireland." What remarkable condescension on the part of this religious rooster! How much obliged Mr. Parnell and his partisans ought to be for such humility on the part of this unholy humbug! How we Irish ought to reward such deference on the part of this profoundly polite Puritan!

But it seems that the scribe in question knows more about the Irish question than Parnell, Gladstone and the Queen of England combined. "Mr. Parnell and friends not doubt tells his handful of Irish haters that Parnell's phon for Ireland's independence is a chimerical, and so forth, and concluded "no wide rapport," nor will Irish independence be well for the world, the dear old British Empire or for Ireland herself." Where does this foul opposition emanate from? The fact is as plain as the nose on the Puritanical face of this bigoted prejudiciator, that his animosity arises against Ireland's freedom simply because Ireland is the brightest gem that sparkles in the coronet of the Queen of Isles! The Parnell of the Pacific—and infatuated fanatics of his form, have grown up in the idea that the Irish people are the lineal heirs of the ever-living Church of God, and that if the "Pats" and "Bridgets" of Ireland could be entirely established free of the face of the earth—Popery would die and Protestantism prevail throughout the world! To gratify this hope such men as the Pacific exhibits would dance with delight on the grave of Liberty, and laugh at the agony of Ireland as she slowly died beneath the brutal tantalus of British rule. But the secret of the Puritanical hate against the Irish people which some Protestants have inherited, and has been sedulously prevented them from possessing that love of liberty which should be the most ardent aspiration of every human soul.

The foolishness of the ideas which this fanatic holds concerning Ireland's right to self-government, consists in his supposing that "Ireland is not a unit in population, industry or religion. What expense nonsense! Is not this country made up each time the time of Washington down to the moment when the Portion of the Pacific formed the Union? Ireland is a unit Again: It is necessary to the acquirement or the sustainment of liberty that a free government should have unit in population, industry or religion? The United States plainly declares that it is not." But, says another paragraph in the same paragraph, "only a part of Ireland's inhabitants are capable of self-government." How on this evangelical epistle, who is constantly quoting Scripture, but not subtly holy, have the smallest knowledge of the capabilities of the Irish race for self government? It is simply impossible that he could. The assertion comes from his anti-American insincerity, as precisely the same charge was brought in the British Parliament over a century ago by the English enemies of the American Republic, from whom this Anglo-American has derived his degenerate ideas concerning man's capacity for self-government. The fact is that the Irish people have all the requisites—both natural and acquired—which are requisite for their entire freedom from British tyranny, and they will yet—please God—achieve their independence, despite the determined spirit of sectarian malice or the antagonism of that class of pro British fakeys in this land, whom it would disgrace the national character to call Americans!

Finally, the fanatic we are flagellating says that the best people in Ireland are to be found in the North, and in a minority, and these would fare badly were Parnell's policy to prevail, "which," adds this lover of Orangeism, "will long go unfulfilled." Let us tell this would-be censor of the Irish race that the worst and most disgraceful faction in Ireland is the monarchy-loving Orangemen of the North. They are nowadays cannonies and ruffianly rowdies whose organization has done more to cause disunion and to cause public disturbance in Ireland than all other religious congregations of that men combined. And so far as the desire of this electro-plated Englishman that Mr. Parnell's dream "may long go unfulfilled" is concerned, we can only say thank God that human freedom has a Defender in heaven whose Power is greater than the combined Puritanical hate to be found in the world, and in eternity, and that this animosity arise against Ireland's freedom simply because Ireland is the brightest gem that sparkles in the coronet of the Queen of Isles! The Parnell of the Pacific—and infatuated fanatics of his form, have grown up in the idea that the Irish people are the lineal heirs of the ever-living Church of God, and that if the "Pats" and "Bridgets" of Ireland could be entirely established free of the face of the earth—Popery would die and Protestantism prevail throughout the world! To gratify this hope such men as the Pacific exhibits would dance with delight on the grave of Liberty, and laugh at the agony of Ireland as she slowly died beneath the brutal tantalus of British rule. But the secret of the Puritanical hate against the Irish people which some Protestants have inherited, and has been sedulously prevented them from possessing that love of liberty which should be the most ardent aspiration of every human soul.

The foolishness of the ideas which this fanatic holds concerning Ireland's right to self government, consists in his supposing that "Ireland is not a unit in population, industry or religion. What expense nonsense! Is not this country made up each time the time of Washington down to the moment when the Portion of the Pacific formed the Union? Ireland is a unit Again: It is necessary to the acquirement or the sustainment of liberty that a free government should have unit in population, industry or religion? The United States plainly declares that it is not." But, says another paragraph in the same paragraph, "only a part of Ireland's inhabitants are capable of self-government." How on this evangelical epistle, who is constantly quoting Scripture, but not subtly holy, have the smallest knowledge of the capabilities of the Irish race for self government? Rain as the New Motor in Making Methodists!

The warfare of the world against the Catholic Church assumes many different aspects as the irrepressible conflict between God-given Truth and Satanical Error continues. This battle began with the birth of our Blessed Redeemer, and it will continue throughout all time, even to the going down of the sun on that day which will witness the sunset of time and the day-dawn of eternity. From Herod, in the days of John down to Hyacinthe in the present day, the demon who perpetually wars against God's Church has never lost without a battle. Emperors, Kings, Queens, Presidents and whole nations, have conspired against the Church of God for the full purpose of destroying her. But our Divine Lord promised that though the very gates of hell should be from against the Church of Christ, no dent should be seen in the adamantine structure which the God who formed it declared should exist for all eternity!

For more than three hundred years the numerous Protestant sects have invented innumerable ways whereby to annihilate the Catholic Church from the world. Yet—mirable dictu!—the Catholic Church exists at this day in all the divine strength of her divine Founder's power, and in all the attributes which she possessed when Christ commissioned her to be the teacher of eternal life, first gave to her primary Apostolic Pontiff and his co-workers in Christianity the command to "Go, preach to all Nations."

We very often wonder if Protestants ever reflect upon the solemn and important words of Christ addressed to Peter and his co-workers in Christianity first planted the Cross and proclaimed Christ crucified. Protestantism cannot point to a single Martyr who died in defence of the peculiar tenets of her peculiar sect. While, on the other hand, every century can furnish its quota of Catholic Bishops, Priests, Sisters and laymen even, who have laid down their lives sooner than give up that true faith which they have received from the Church. Catholic martyrs have lived, and firmly believe that their faith is from God, hence they are fortified against all doubt and derelicting God in the face of His most serious enemies. But where is the sectarian who can truly say that he has peculiar pinchpiece in the crazy quilt of Protestantism is better than the other patch-pieces surrounding him? There are sects may number by the world worldly. Not one of them has ever contained—or ever will contain—even the smallest and most indolescent fraction of that Divine Spirit which Christ promised to give to the Apostles and their successors in the Church, when, in the Gospel of St. Matthew, Christ said to them: "Behold I am with you all days, even to the consummation of the world." Because the power of God was with Father Hecker, Father Walworth, that Rain in Rochester, Mormon Joe Smith, Brigham Young, Mormon Elder Rigdon, Mormon Elder Pratt, Mormon Elder Hyde, Mormon Elder Kelly, of the Cathedral, Second Master of Ceremonies.

CELEBRATION OF GRACE'S ANNIVERSARY.

After the first gospel Rev. W. H. Hume, Archbishop Ryan's secretary, read the letter received from the Pope, while the choir rendered the Ecce Sacerdos Magnus, and the Tantum Ergo, the latter being sung by Mr. Mazzi's Cathedral for the occasion. Archbishop Ryan then read the Pontifical Mass, in most edifying manner. The Church was packed to overflowing with people and the auxiliary bishops, clergymen, the priests and the seminary boys, who were very attentive to prelates of motion, interspersed with rules roses and other flowers. The sermon was a complete feast of reason, and the bouquets of the richest and rarest flowers that Ireland's Ireland could produce. Even when the hundreds of candles were lighted, the star prominent was the sun of Grace, the illustrious of all who labored in the Vineyard. The Sisters of the Sacred Heart, who have charge of the flowers and ornaments in decorating them, must feel a due share of the honor conferred on the Church on the occasion of the Jubilee of Grace.

St. Mary's Cathedral would have to be enlarged to at least the dimensions of Rome, to accommodate the vast throng of people that wanted to be present at the Jubilee of Grace, and many times had utterly been taken to leave tickets to all who desired to be present, and a special arrangement was carried out admirably by the Cathedral Committee, by which the hundreds of people successfully worked their way from California street to the Cathedral, and vice versa, without any hitch. Although the vast throng that surrounded the cathedral, and the great crowd of people who had to stand on the opposite side walk to the vacs hope that, by some miraculous intervention, there was even standing room in the vestibule.

THE PALLIUM.

(The following Ode, suggested by the beautiful and appropriate ceremony of the Pallium, which Rome has respectfully intended to his Grace, Archbishop Ryan, is from the pen of a lady friend.)

Long ages since, with cruel gleam
Of mitigating sword,
A stalwart Saint's Blanian stream
Was dyed in blood red.
Sweet Amen! gentlest virtue-lamb!
Thy Pastor's crook
For fruitful seed of tithes latin
Thy martyr blood was shed
Well doth thy Rome, with grateful hand,
Thy sacred Pallium shrine,
Then brighten with the single hand
Of Ryan, Pastor Prime.
Its fine, mellow, silk-lustrous length
Adorns thy vestal Feast,
Where, on the spirit hushlike fervent
Before the white robed Priest,
Of Apostolic hands are laid,
In benediction sweet,
And then, on shoulders shining
With ruthless movement feet,
Thy delicate tissue love of smiling peace
From the pure body shell,
Thy gentle types are call.
Thy gentle types are call.
Thy lambs of Christ, to receive
Thy lambs of spotless wool
And from that stony wind they years
Those melious blest and bright,
The Pallia pure—the sacred dower
Of Apostolic Rome.
The mystic signs of priestly power,
Thy types of mercy, love,
Thy yoke, O, Agnus Dei! worn
Thy gentle mark to be
Mark shavers of the topless home
Of Christ, Lord Jesus Christ.

Farm and Home.

Meet Your Husband with a Smile.

There are two sides of this question. It is just as much the husband's duty to meet his wife with a smile, as it here to greet him thus cheerily, as she most assuredly should do.

He comes home tired, does he? fretted with care, disgusted with the world, he needs rest and cheer. So he does; just he needs also to bring cheer and courage with him. Why not? Is not he the stronger vessel, forsooth?

The world is down for the Sun, complained of, done; and the feeling of no much gained, so much accomplished, is in itself a comfort. He is tired and hungry; rest and food excite him, sympathy and affection. He may have met on the world with deceit and selfishness and cold indifference; but in the home must be kind, cheerful and understanding, his wife admires and honors and believes in him to the very core of her heart.

But if he comes home moody, silent, worried, and returns her welcoming smile with frowns of gloom, what then? He meets an acquaintance—perhaps a man for whom he has little esteem, perhaps a struggling woman he despises, perhaps a gigglingbread-and-butter miss, capable of little save slang and cachinnation—but he has to be courteous, all urbanity, frowns, short answers, other claimants.

Man, for pity's sake be at least as kind, as polite, as willing to please and to be pleased, when at home with your wife and children, as when you are with strangers! Seek as earnestly to please and to be pleased by the one you would the chosen guest. Tell her the pleasant things you meet as well as the painful ones, it will do you good as well as her; listen as kindly to her words as you would to those of another; be as patient with her mistakes as politeness teaches you to be with strangers. She toils as hard in proportion to her strength as you do (I am speaking of the working class), and in ways that are more nerve harrowing, monotonous, and wearing. All she asks is your love, your sympathy. She would be first in your heart as you are to hers; she wants to known that her personality, her ways are so interesting and dear to you as yours are to her. She wants you to feel tenderly for her weariness and pain. Probably she hides all of it she can, to spare your feelings. She grieves over her vanquished youth and freshness for your sake more than her own. She bears you only the better for the bald spot on your head; the deep furrows in your brow, the stoop of your shoulders. You are as different from the sturdy, handsome youth she married, as she is from your blooming bride, but you are only the dearer for it. Is pity, man, in honor, in all manly nobility, not her love for love, truth for truth? And by all that is honorable and manly, I conjure you, treat her with such courteous consideration, such tender respect that one shall dare treat her slightingly! Who so sets with disrespect toward her does double dishonor to you! Join no younger, prettier, paper woman in playful depreciation, or in harsh criticism of her, or in opposition and condescending commiseration.

Is she plain? She does not expect you to call her beautiful, nor to be blind to another's beauty; only to have that she is dear to you in spite of her plainness. Is she shy, deformed, peculiar? Let it be seen that having chosen her in spite of these things, she has value that outweighs my deficiency. Treat her, and see that she is treated, as respectfully as you desire to be treated yourself. People will render you double honor because you honor her. You will have your reward, here as well as hereafter.

Home Conversation.

Nothing in the home life needs to be more carefully studied and more diligently cultivated than the conversation. It should be unbosom with the spirit of love. No harsh word should be spoken. The happiness of husband and wife in their intercourse depends much on the way he talks to her. A word or even a tone should never be uttered. The warmth and tenderness of their heart should flow out in every word that they speak to each other. As parents, too, in the intercourse with the children, they should never speak sneer in words of Christ-like patience. It is a fatal mistake to suppose that children's lives can grow up into beauty in an atmosphere of strife. Harsh, angry words are to their sensitive souls what frosts are to flowers. To bring them up in the nurture of the Lord is to bring them up as Christ himself would, and except that would be with infinite tenderness. The blessed influence of loving speech day after day and month after month is as impossible to estimate. It is like the falling of warm spring sunshine and rain on the garden. Beauty and evenness of character are likely to come from such a home.

A $25,000 Cow Lost.

Mrs. Samuel M. Shoemaker has lost by death from inflammation of the lungs the world-renowned cow, Princess Second, which astonished the world by giving in seven days a yield of 46 pounds and 10½ ounces of butter. This test of her butter qualities was completed April 10, 1883. Some time after the tests the blankets were taken off rather suddenly, it is thought, and she took a cold, from which she never recovered. She was a magnificent animal, of great vitality and force, as well as a fine butter producer. One of the secrets of her immense yields of butter was her great vitality and appetite. During the very height of the test, while she was fed as large quantities of butter-producing food as it was thought she could safely bear, she broke loose one night and consumed over 200 pounds of premium hay in a box in the stable. About two years ago Mr. Shoemaker refused $25,000 for her. She was eight years and six months old when she died. She was an imported cow, and was bought at auction in New York for $1,500. She was of the celebrated Cocomaria strain. Her last calf was sold during an absence from home of Mrs. Shoemaker for $10,000, but the sale did not stand. Mrs. Shoemaker refusing to ratify it on her return.

While the Burnside Park Jersey herd has sustained great loss in the death of Princess Second, it is thought her place will be taken than filled by a noble cow of grand physique of the same strain. This animal Oxford Kate, a lineal relative of Princess Second, has already a record of 30 pounds 12 ounces of butter in seven days, which is already second to Princess Second, and yet she has never been pushed it is believed she can beat the foremost record. The father of this cow sold for $9,150. All the Burnsides hard are in fine condition.

Where the Scorpion gets his Poison.

When he strikes you with the end of his tail, like a whip, he expends a venomous liquid, and a man might better hold a red-hot iron in his hand than to get a tenth part of a drop of this liquid into his blood. It is not necessarily fatal, particularly in the Behemas; but it confounds the best of human furnaces. In some parts of South American scorpion bites are frequently fatal, but I have not heard of any one having been killed by them in Nassau. Many have been counted for. The scorpion likes to feed on decayed wood. In South America, where dya-woods and other poisonous woods abound, the scorpion feeds upon them, and that work into themselves a good supply of outside poison, which, taken together with its naturally poisonous liquid, does its work for whoever is unfortunate enough to be stung. But, in Nassau, such poisonous woods are few, and the scorpions have to fatten themselfras respectably on pine, cedar, and mahogany.

Family Fun.

Afraid of Treats.

"How my good man, read that. It will do your soul good," said a tract distributor to an old man whom he found seated on the city door-house steps, deeply absorbed in thought. He handed the old man a tract as he spoke, "Oh out," ingratiatingly replied the man, "my soul's all right, sir; my kidneys, no's my liver. That air thing looks mighty interesting, but as sure as I need it, I and begin to get interested in it, and I'm afraid it will run off on to some patent medicine, and wind up by asking me, 'how's my liver? No, sir, I'm as sound as a bullet, and don't care about such literature."

Rising to the Occasion.

A youngster of four, rather noted for his depravity than otherwise, was taken into his mother's bedroom the other day and introduced to his baby sister, one day old. He seemed to look on the new arrival with considerable embarrassment, not annoyed with disapproval, and at the same time to appreciate the fact that it expected much of him to my somebody, certainly the responsible man whom he despised, perhaps a giggling-bread-and-butter miss, capable of little save slang and cachinnation—but he has to be courteous, all urbanity, frowns, short answers, other claimants.

Old Fashioned Patriotism.

Representative Eldridge, of Adrian, who has positive notions of what constitutes patriotism, says the Detroit Free Press, listened to a Fourth of July oration by a prominent Democrat in his district of that stripe. He hoped that a hundred years had wiped out the bitterness that had existed between Mother England and the colonies, and that Americans and Britons would forget the struggle of 100 years ago in a fraternal embrace.

Col. Eldridge heard the whole speech, and when it was finished he immediately sought out the minister and said to him with considerable heat:

"Mr. Minister, do you call that a Fourth of July speech? Do you think that your ancestors were patriotic? I don't, sir; the Fourth of July it is the bounden duty of every American to pay for his sins and d—d Britishers, and are ready to do it again! That's the kind of talk I like to hear to day."

Her Week Day Beau.

Mrs. Judge Peterby of Austin employs a colored cook named Matilda Scandal, who is a great favorite with the sterner sex, but who is very high-toned, nevertheless.

"Who was that horrid-looking negro I saw prowling about the back yard?" asked Mrs. Peterby, indignantly.

"Dat's a fellar I keeps company wid on Sundays."

"On week days?"

"Yes, ma'am; yer don't s'pose I'd be seen wid such a bandy-legged, giggle-eyed moke like him on Sundays, does yer! Yer oster see de colled gemman I keeps company wid on Sundays. You'd be s'prised, yer would."

An Unfortunate Man.

Too Busy Talking to Listen.

"Well, how did you like the sermon, today?"

"The sermon!"

"Yes; you were at church, weren't you?"

"Why, yes; certainly.

"Well, then, you will how you liked the sermon, I suppose! You heard it didn't you?"

"Heard it? Certainly not, I belong to the choir."

An Impossible Performance.

The teacher was trying to teach the boy something about navigation.

"Now, suppose your father should start to-morrow morning to walk across the river, could he do it?"

"No, sir."

"Of course not," said the teacher, much encouraged, "and why not?"

"Because—"

"Yes, go on—because"—

"Because he is jail, sir."

The Bride and Wealth.

Uncle Muse approached the county clerk and handed him the marriage license. The clerk, in order to poke fun at the old man, said seriously.

"I hope the bride has got 75 cents in cash, for the Legislature has passed a law requiring us to issue a license unless the bride has that amount."

The old man fished up his papers, born," said Uncle Muse, approaching the clerk, then he turned over and whispered to his ear, "the reliable rumors about a dollar and a quarter."

Fresh from the Wood.

When President Cleveland was asked to appoint Judge Tree to a foreign mission, he replied:

"I'd just as leaf as not."

This gracious answer to the applicants was received with a profound bow.

"In making this appointment, however," continued the chief magistrate, "it is not to be considered by any branches of the judge's family that they have only to apply for a position to be appointed."

"Certainly, know," was the response.

"Then, I guess, you can tell Judge Tree to pack his trunk," said the President.

"Yes, ma'am, of course, to appoint him," he nodded.

"We knew you would," was the reply.

"Well," said the President, "I was sure that Judge Tree did not pine for the office, nevertheless, in such a position I am anxious to see, as our English friends would say, a good man at the rim, and while I'm maple—"

"Chestnuts," exclaimed the delegation in a breath.

Scriptural Mugwumps.

A Lynn Sunday school teacher last Sunday was discussing the Laodiceans spoken of in the Revelations as "neither hot nor cold." "There are such kind of people that we see sometimes to day," she said. "People with no positive convictions, no decided views, no pronounced principles of their own, and who never come out emphatically either on one side or another. But you ever see any such people as that, Johnny?" she said to the smallest boy in the class. "Yes," replied Johnny, "but they don't call 'em Laodiceans, now a days. They calls 'em mugwumps."

CATHOLIC KNIGHTS OF AMERICA.

Monthly Bulletin for August.

OFFICE OF SUPREME SECRETARY, C. K. OF A., } LAFAYETTE, KY., Sept. 1, 1885.

As my health, strength, and time will allow, I publish a source of interest and information to the branches but have a greater appreciation, I will render my thanks for the many kind and flattering notices, and will endeavor to merit the praise so lavishly bestowed, by making the Bulletin a budget of useful and interesting information to the C. K. of A.

New Insurance Claims, Total January, 1st, Line Reissues, 37; Net Gain, 12; Total Claims Paid Since Organization, $1,111,111; Total Assessments Collected Since Organization, $1,200,000; Total Number of Members, 26,000; New Risks, $282,000. Application for Charter, 1885, 1886, 1887, 1888, 1889, 1890.

The Branch Chartered, No. 406, at St. Simeons, Mo. There are ten applications for Charter in Illinois, and one in Kansas. Thousands of deceased members, of which Kentucky recorded 1, Illinois 1, Pennsylvania, New York, Ohio and Nebraska received two thousand each.

The Tennessee Knights are making strenuous efforts to double their membership, and there seems to be crowning their good work. The Rt. Rev. Bishop of Nashville has applied for new branch.

The California Knights have secured the services of Monsignor Capel to assist in their behalf, and expect to reap a rich reward as the result of his labor for them, which will be given in full in our next Bulletin. As the Order has not yet a foothold in the West, we would be pleased to see the Order grow in the East. We have no Branches in the States of Delaware, Connecticut, New Hampshire, Maine or Vermont. In the Dominion of Canada, we should there be very happy to see the Knights of the Order; from Branches are organized, and we hope to see the Knights of the Order, therefore, in order to secure a foothold in the above mentioned States we wish our Brethren in the East to send in the address of a competent Knight, who will go from State to State; that we may be placed in correspondence with him. We will be pleased to see Societies or Organization papers to any responsible party, who will take the agency of forming a Branch of the Order.

I will again call attention of the Recording Secretaries to the law requiring them to report to the Chairman of the Supreme Trustee, once in the month, the amount of money forwarded to the Supreme Secretary and Supreme Treasurer. It takes but a few moments to make the report, and it should not be neglected. It is important that the Supreme Trustee should know the exact amount of money forwarded to the Supreme Secretary and Supreme Treasurer, and that they may be enabled to compare the amount received by them with the report of the Supreme Secretary and Treasurer. The Chairman of the Supreme Trustees, J. J. Duffy, Esq., Memphis, Tenn., is one of that there are many Branches in the Order, and it is hard for him to do the duties he asked by the President of each Branch at the first meeting in each month if the report has been forwarded, and if not let it be done at once. There is another very important duty which the officers and members should look into at each meeting. That is to ascertain if any Transfer has been issued, and if the members have paid into your Branch W. A. Ward, and if he holds a receipt for the same, and if he has, let it be produced and read in open meeting, and should be insisted on, or receipt are promptly sent out by the Supreme Secretary, and if not forwarded to the Supreme Secretary within one month, I have several instances where Branch Transfers have held the money of their members until the Branch was threatened with suspension, and in other cases the Transfer was not issued until the Branch was crippled. Members should therefore insist on receipts, if their money be reached their destination or if it is in the hands of derelict Treasurer. Be late, promptness in performing your duties, evince more regularity, take an interest in everything conducive to the welfare of the Order, don't wait for some one else to keep the Order up, but be yourselves the ones to do something, you will be rewarded with satisfaction, or happy. Those who do the greatest work are always those who are most anxious for the work.

Send in your assessments promptly, and the C. K. of A. will pay it out to your widows and orphans as fast as the death rate of members call for it.

Fraternally, JOHN BURKE,
Supreme Secretary, C. K. of A.

Important Decision by President Russell.

A very important question has just become settled in the ranks of the C. K. of A. For some time past application that belonged to other societies, though more assistance were not continuous by the Church, were rejected. In answer to inquiry of the Secretary of Branch 106, the Supreme President writes:

Dear Sir—Your letter of the 24th inst. received. In reply I beg to state that the Supreme President writes:

ed with anxiety, and at times with gloom, the proceedings—It they could be called proceedings—which took place in certain purlieus of the capital of Italy, doctored for us from day to day in the newspapers, and we knew that while the emissaries of the author of "Vaticanism" (issues) were working day by day with shameless and unexampled vigor, that we, the faithful and loyal subjects, were bound to keep our mouth closed. Throughout Ireland, Ireland was the loyal-tied because we respected and venerated the procedure of the Church in the appointment of its ministers (hear,). We regarded this as not a matter for our interference, and had the Archbishop of Dublin sent here been whom he might,

WE, AS CATHOLICS WOULD HAVE BEEN BOUND TO ACCEPT HIM

And now that he will soon be amongst us, I am sure you require no assurance from me of the enthusiasm of the Irish people, which will be accorded to our shepherd. I pray that his reign amongst us may be long—(applause)—that it may be fruitful in everything which he could desire, and that having presided over this one, honored at one time by a mitre and a pastoral, he will continue to watch the course of an expanding Church and a happy country—(applause)—and when at length he is borne to the grave, followed by a sorrowing people within this sacred edifice, it may not be until he has been spared to see his ripe hand to give his last blessing to a liberated people (prolonged applause.)

A NEW CATHOLIC CHURCH IN MARIPOSA COUNTY.

HOMITON, Cal., Sept. 14, 1885.

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR—

Dear Sir—The Catholics in this section of the country have witnessed yesterday an unusual festival, the description of which, I think, will be appreciated by the readers of your valuable paper.

Rev. A. Fassnotti of Mariposa, after months of constant work, admirably succeeded in building a fine, little church in the small town of Bishop Dubin, or, as it is called, Santa Cruz, which is situated in the very centre of a district of older, though, in the country of a more dense population, which form the majority of settlers in this district. Yesterday the church dedicated to the Holy Cross, and the little town of Indian Gulch will always remain the beautiful festival.

Early in the morning a great number of people began to assemble, not only from the towns surrounding, but came from distant places in the and the adjoining counties. The town was literally overflowed with wagons and carriages, which brought not only Catholic people, but also many belonging to different denominations. After celebrating early Mass, in Hornitos, the Rev. Father came to this town and began the ceremony at half-past 10 o'clock.

The Catholic choir of Hornitos composed of about twenty-five voices, assisted by the choir of Mariposa, rendered the Gregorian and Lambillotte's Masses in very creditable style. After the ceremony of the blessing of the church, High Mass was begun, and the choir sang the Gloria, which constituted the diagnosis of their faith. The choir sang Sullivan's Creed Mass; it was the first time "Credo" musically adapted for the congregation to hear the Creed, chanted to the Blessed Sacrament, after which the Rev. Father preached a sermon on the duty of Catholics towards the Church of which they are members.

The altar was finely decorated, and everything was accompanied by an air of recent date for the church, which was built in the space of two hours. May the people always remember the ceremonies witnessed yesterday, and may the promises made before the Lord of Hosts on such an occasion.

Yours truly,
CORRESPONDENT.

EDIFYING LETTER FROM A CONVERT.

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR—

Dear Sir—I send you a postal order for three dollars to renew my subscription to the Monitor, which paper I shall continue to take as long as I remain in this state, and I wish I could induce all our Catholics here to take it. I have often to laugh when I read some extracts copied from some bigoted Protestant paper, going for the Catholic Church, condemning what they know nothing about. This used to vex me once, but it does not now; I rather pity the poor blindness of people who that their eyes to the truth, and that is the truth to be met with everywhere, by the help of God, to live according to the Divine teachings of the Holy Church, the more glorious the harmony, and this holy religion is spreading so fast in this country. I am a convert from the Church of the Holy Cross, and the Holy Ghost, the Holy Spirit, the Holy Ghost, the Holy Spirit, the Holy Ghost, the Holy Spirit,

IRON FAN MURPHY.
CALIFORNIA!

A wonderful land arose in the west
Like a sea nymph fair on the ocean's breast,
Rather if said emerging from the foam of Peace
That mantly stay to clasp large miles increase.
Her mountains are rich with gold,
That can warm the heart and brighten the eyes,
The tropical breeze o'er the ocean blows
To odorous breath from the land of Flowers.

Above her the sky is stainless and blue
As that of Italia that poets imbue.
While the stars look down with their crystal eyes
Their mirror the land in the far away skies.
With field silver fleecy, and grass the Golden crown
With her hills and valleys, and the Golden crown
Adorning her brow with their blooming flowers,
Her rivers and rills with their rocky towers.

Her plains like irons as sentinels stand
The appointed of God to watch o'er His land;
To them are the souls of the brave old
Whose voices are heard in the breezes bold;
In peace of plaintive lullaby sing
And their mountain arms so joyously swing,
Awaking the echoes asleep in the hills
While forest and tower with melody thrills.

And deep in the earth in rocky bound
Is the ghostly gloom are the rich genome,
Away from the sun and the daylight bright
They mortly toil from the morn till the night.
They mortly sing of work all day
In their caverns deep from the world away.
Their sun is the gold; and the shining light
Illumine their homes with its radiance bright.

Fantastic and weird it fills about
All around, above, now in, and then out;
They live in the mists; in the mists grow old
And mortly die for the shibboleth gold.
Their people are shadows of people
Pale and round limbed as s'er sculptor dedicated,
Tagian and Raven, the Norman and Dane
A people have left without blemish or stain.

The children of Adam, and Eve and Cain
Are strongly warm blood 'mid the northern skies
Commingled with blood of the north and east
Our glorious type of the west released.
Orphaned, free, in a land of wealth and wine
With a noble soul in their shining eyes
Unbarred and fearless, yet tender and true
The greatest of people the world ever knew.

Oh, glorious land! the home of the free!
With a golden vail o'er thy virgin breast,
Hail, land of the sun, of the fir, and rose;
From summits of snow, to forests of pine
From tropical valleys, broad and low,
From trees and mounts to the placid sea,
We love thee full well, oh, thou land blest
Than star of the west now shining so grand.

Oh, land of the lotus, land of my love,
Who tastes of thy sweetness will never more rove,
In life and in death to thy shores they turn
In life and in death with thy love they burn.
When peace wanders from home to the cold vast,
And the mighty Present is lost in the Past,
When wrapt from the earth and by all forgot
Our souls shall remember this well-loved spot.

Ruth's Romance.

BY MAURICE C. WALSH.

On a recent visit to Washington, while with a friend, eight-seeing, we visited the elegant building donated by the great philanthropist, W. W. Corcoran, to the use of elderly spinsters and indigent widows, and called the "Old Ladies' Home."

Among the many there dwelling, was one very intelligent, middle aged lady who was desirous to give us the history of her life, asserting as that it was as interesting as a novel.

We felt disposed to listen, and the lady's fine eyes brightened up as she commenced to narrate her story:

Perhaps you will scarcely credit the fact that I was once one of the belles of Richmond; but it is, nevertheless, true, though I do not now retain much trace of the beauty I possessed at that time, when I was a girl of twenty. My name is Ruth Preston. My parents were rich, and we dwelt in a fine old mansion on the banks of the James.

Among my acquaintances was a young man named Walter Lostine, son of a wealthy parent encouraged him more than any of the other gallants, and all supposed he was a most eligible suitor for my heart and hand.

He was a handsome youth, and possessed most winning manners; he aspired, warily, while a spasm of intense pain flitted across his countenance.

"Oh, Walter, for my sake, but more especially for your own, will you heed my warning? Turn your face to the throne of grace and let your prayers ascend to God who has created you to enjoy eternal happiness—

"Hush, are you a Catholic?" he faltered.

"I am."

"Well, if I were to embrace any religion, I would prefer that to all others. Listen. Since we parted and you refused my hand in second offer of fidelity, I have studied up the subject of Catholicity thoroughly. I have read many of the most eminent works and have arrived at the conclusion that it is, in reality, the only true religion."

I listened eagerly, and he continued:

"Some I was wounded, ten days ago, I have been receiving instructions from good Sister of Charity who by her piety, zeal and solicitous attention, heal lingth exceeded in removing every vestige of doubt from my mind. I was baptized only this morning by Father McCarthy and——

"Oh, Walter, how glad, how delighted I am! Now I can pray with you, and if ever loved you, that love is now intensified a thousand-fold. It is a love that will penetrate beyond the grave and pierce into the realms of sensation bliss hereafter.

I could control my pent-up feelings no longer, but burst into tears.

While I was thus giving way to my emotions of joy, affection and gratitude, a dark form entered the cast.

I looked up and perceived the kindly, sympathetic face of a Sister of Charity.

Colonel Lostine introduced her as Sister Angelina, and explained that I was an old friend of his.

The Sister who had been instrumental in bringing about Walter's conversion was to me a saintly personage indeed.

We talked fervently in the dying man for some hours, and I only left his side when Brace came and advised me that Captain Preston was anxious to see me.

In the afternoon I returned to the Colonel's seat, where I was just in time to see Father McCarthy administering the last sacraments.

* * * *

Walter died that night and his death was a holy and most exemplary one.

I felt in my heart that God in His infinite goodness had heard my prayers offered daily for the conversion of Walter Lostine, and had fully accorded him the grace of conversion.

I have only to add that my brother, now Colonel Preston, through Father McCarthy's kindly ministrations, also embraced the true faith, and has so powerful an interesting family of devoted young Catholics thereof about his house as he tells them of the final conversion of an infidel. Thus, sir, is Ruth's Romance.

We left the good lady with many thoughtful reflections.

Is There a Cure for Consumption?

We answer unreservedly, yes! If the patient commences in time the use of Dr. Pierce's "Golden Medical Discovery," and exercises proper care. If allowed to run for some too long all medicine is powerless to avail. Dr. Pierce never deceives a patient by holding out a false hope. For the sale of incurable cures, the "Golden Medical Discovery" has cured thousands of patients, who nothing else seemed to avail. Druggists sell it. A TRUE STORY.

BY MRS. F. F. MOUTRIE.

Anna Roberts and Joseph Parkinson met each other pretty often at the house of mutual friends. They soon liked each other well enough to think of taking each other for better or for worse for a life-time, and they made the usual promises at the altar stage. He was making money in a very good business, he belonged to a society which reckoned many good young men in its ranks, and he always attended, by his conduct, his companions and friends.

He had belonged to one of the Temperance societies in connection with his Church, and his mother, who was a good Christian in the fullest meaning of the word, died just before he was married, to ask his intended to join one of the Temperance societies in the city. His reply to his mother was that there were very good people outside of the Temperance societies; his intended took only her glass of beer, and why should he deprive her of it! His mother replied:

"I should be sorry to think there were not many good people in the world who have never joined any Temperance society; and it was only your mother and her companions that I wished for this unity of principle. Promise me, Joseph, that you will do your duty to help his falling brethren."

He did promise, but he shook his head as he said:

"Mother, I'm a good-natured fellow, and I'm no fool either, and I'm glad to Hell for any man, if I can help, I would catch from Satan."

Our hero, Joseph Parkinson, was in some fear for his wife, his heart overflowing with happiness. He was liberal to her, giving her money freely for household purposes. On his return home an evening or two after comparing their new house, he noticed that his wife's face was very much flushed, and he thought there was an odor of brandy from her. She said she had got a bad fit of indigestion, and that nothing could relieve her but a brandy. Again and again the bad indigestion returned, and the brandy was repeated. It was one day taken for toothache, another day for some other affection, it was never acknowledged to have been taken out of pure affection for itself, and it dawned upon his mind that she had a strong attachment for the fiery liquid. Naturally of a placid temper, his feelings were much excited when he came to this conclusion. He went to the clergyman who married them, and told him of his trouble and how the discovery had aroused the fiend of anger within him. The clergyman told him to be patient, to let him speak to her which he soon did, to no purpose.

Then Joseph Parkinson said to himself: "This will not do, I cannot live with her, the temptation is to me to kill her is too strong. I cannot trust myself one moment in her company when I see her intoxicated. I loathe her; and if I stay the devil will assuredly tempt me to commit murder."

He sold his business, his house, and his furniture, and left Liverpool for Australia.

"He could not," he said, "share his soul and live with her." From time to time he wrote to the clergyman asking about her. For a long time he heard no good news of her, after she realized that he was dead, she raised of a good, loving companion, a broken, a projector, she for whole indulged even more freely; and it was not until the last year of every was reported to her and that she was shunned and avoided, no one being pity on her, on account of the misery she brought on one good man, that she began to be ashamed of herself and to feel sorrow for her wicked madness.

She went to the clergyman who married them, and asked him if he would write to Joseph, to tell him of her sorrow for her wicked madness.

The clergyman was shocked at the sin, sobbing and sorrowful, bewailing the life he had ship wrecked, the grief she had brought upon her husband. She made the clergyman promise to write to Joseph, to tell him of her sorrow, not to mention any thing about her promises for anything she might want; but the most remote of all was to attend to her religious duties punctually and regularly. After some time the gave orders before she gave scandal.

The clergyman in answering her husband's letters told him she was going on from day to day every year. Joseph himself worked steadily on, never touching in his hand the cup of the enemy, never touching his own meals money, and yet was still afraid to return, fearing a relapse of his with his fiery habits. The clergyman wrote, telling him that she had been well tried and had eaten too often the bread of sorrow to fear a return of the evil days. After a space of time, covering ten years, he returned to his native city and sought out his wife, but she took again to his home, and say they are beginning a new life, absat-ned by trials in the past, and with hope in the future.

Life in Germany.

A recent traveller in Germany gives the following interesting information concerning that country:

A custom that struck me curiously was that of having the shops in the basements of the handsomest houses—in the most fashionable streets—butchers, shoemakers, notion stores, jewelers, all can be found in the radius of a block in any given point. It is undoubtedly convenient for the people, but it mars the beauty of the street very much. My mind has grown to market, I believe; at the time she returned and is preparing the second breakfast, which usually at 11 and consists of a couple of eggs and a slice of brown bread and perhaps a glass of milk or water, but for the children and the rest of the family it is usually a slice of brown bread on coch and a half think with a little cold meat. Occasionally a cup of chocolate varies the monotony.

Then comes the dinner at 1—soup, meat and vegetables and dessert; the latter for children are allowed to have only on Sundays. After the soup has been served the meat is taken out of the soup pot and placed on a dish, and on no account would a servant be allowed to take more than has been given her. The same plan is followed with the meat and vegetables. After the dinner dishes are washed and the kitchen put in order, the maid dresses and takes the children out for a walk in the park, returning in time for 5 o'clock coffee, which seven is the little three-year-old boy of my landlady drank every day. It was a problem to me how those children kept their health—the coffee in the morning and afternoon and at 8 o'clock the more nourishing chocolate not endius it.

At 8 o'clock supper is eaten; cold meats, tea, milk, or bear, and bread and butter are served, and the family retire, and always done out of the house, so that beside the work of one maid very materially. All fruit, cake, tea and coffee are always bought ready made as we say of clothes, and the family live very economically, and it always throughout done.

A good servant only gets more than 200 a year and in many families only $12. They are allowed one Sunday evening out in two weeks, and if they come home later than they promised they do not go out again for a month. All disputes between mistress and maid are settled by the police.

A LEGEND OF INISFALLEN.

[This legend, of which a correct translation is given below, was dropped from the original manuscript, when that of the middle ages, to the Celtic Society, of Dublin, and read by one of the members at their regular monthly entertainment held in the house, on the 2nd Sunday of September at Knights of the Red Branch Hall.]

There flourished towards the close of the tenth century a very remarkable and learned man, named Maelmaedhog O'Gorman, who was a bard of the Eugenian tribes of the territory of Loch Leine. He attained great eminence as a scholar. He is styled the chief Ollav or Doctor of Ireland in poetry, in the notice of his death, under the year 1009, in the annals of Ireland, called Tigernach. He attained also a high degree of ecclesiastical and historical story-crowned. There is reason to think that Brian Boru was educated under the care of this Maelmaedhog, and at subsequent time he had him named the Anmakers or Counsellor of that great Dalcassian chief, when monarch of Erin.

His association with Brian is well evidenced by a curious note still legible in the Book of Armagh, kept in Trinity College, Dublin. This note was written about the year 1002 by Maelmaedhog's own hand, in the presence of the King of Erin, and in behalf of it is O'Curry's "Manuscript Materials of Ancient Irish History", copies of which are in the hands of the foremost scholars of Trinity College, Dublin, and there is also a copy in our San Francisco public library. There is no doubt but it was the composition of the Annals of Inisfallen, though it has to be commented upon antiquarian before his time.

Maelmaedhog's Annals of Inisfallen, being since lost; but considerable of their contents are found copied in other manuscripts still extant, as was the singular but interesting legend of Inisfallen.

When the Catholic National University was established in Dublin, in 1854, the learned Eugene O'Curry was called to the chair of Ancient Irish History, and during the year's 1855 and 1856 he delivered before that body twenty one lectures, on which the Irish Annals were the text, and hands that were burning. On last Sunday morning I was in the Hotel Dieu of Trenton, young lady in the Hotel Dieu of Trenton, attending the hospital for lepers. Never in my whole life was I so impressed with the sublimity of divine Christian charity as when contemplating the work of the Sisters of Charity in WEDNESDAY SEPTEMBER 30, 1885.

DECREE OF OUR FATHER LEO XIII.

In accordance with the requirements of a Circular Letter sent to the Rev. Cleary last week on Holy Father Leo XIII., was read at all the Masses throughout the Archdiocese on Sunday last.

DECREE:

Among the many acts of Apostolic vigilance by which our Most Holy Lord Pope Leo XIII., from his entrance into the Chair of Peter Pontifical, has earnestly aimed to provide with the help of God for the restoration of desired tranquility to the Church, and the whole of society, the present month is chiefly seen of the Encyclical Supremi Apostolatus of September 1, 1883, regarding the celebration of the most sacred Rosary of Mary the glorious Mother of God, during the whole month of October of that year. The object of the Rosary was sweetly instituted by a special providence of God for the main purpose of implacing the potent prompt aid of the Queen of Heaven against the enemies of Christianity, protecting the integrity of Faith in the Flock of Christ, and watching from the way of eternal perdition souls redeemed at the price of Divine Blood. The most pleasing fruits of Christian piety and of such great benefit in all patronage of the Virgin Mary that were during the month gathered from that salutary work in every part of the Catholic world, and also still pending misfortune, led to the instance, October 20th, of the following year, 1884, of the Apostolic Letter Superiore anno with the same exhortations and commands for the dedication of the then approaching month of October to the honor of Our Lady of the Rosary by a similar science rite and formal piety; for it seemed meet, that the results of a great work and pledge of coming victory in perseverance to what is undertaken. Pursuing the course, Our Holy Lord, since on the one hand many evils are still afflicting us on every side, and on the other hand there still abide and flourish in Christians that Faith which works through charity, and that almost unanimous confidence with veneration in the Loving Mother of God, wishes we should now all the more earnestly and eagerly persevere with one mind in prayer with Mary the Mother of Jesus. For the certain hope rises within him that she who alone has destroyed all heresies in the whole world, shall, with the addition on our part of merits worthy of penance, soon the polishing wrath of Divine justice to unbend, and shall bring to us safety and peace.

Wherefore, whatever His Holiness decreed the last two years as to the month during which the admirable virtues of the Blessed Virgin Mary of the Rosary are celebrated, he commands and decrees this year likewise and the years to follow as long as this most afflicting condition of the Church and of States endures, and it is not given to the Church to give thanks to God for the Restoration of full liberty to the Supreme Pontiff. He decrees therefore and commands that every year from the first day of October to the second of the following November in all parochial churches of the Catholic world, and in all public churches dedicated to the Mother of God, or even chapels to be chosen by the Ordinary, at least five decades of the Rosary of the Blessed Mary Mother of Lourdes be recited daily; and if it be on the morning that Mass be celebrated during the prayers, if in the afternoon the Blessed Sacrament be exposed for adoration and Benediction daily given. He desires also that, where civil laws allow it, the Sodality of the Most Sacred Rosary erected under further of religion.

Editorial Notes.

—During the last two months Archbishop Ryan has administered the Sacrament of Confirmation to upwards of twenty-five thousand persons in the diocese of Philadelphia, and has not yet visited all the churches there.

—Sister Mary Madeline Hanniger, of St. Vincent's Orphanage, Washington Road, Cork City, was buried recently from the Convent of Mercy, St. Mary's of the Isle. The obsequies were attended by a large concourse of people. Sister Mary Madeline for twenty years she labored in the city, and during the terrible small-pox epidemic attended to the wants of the sufferers with the greatest heroism and devotion.

—When in Chicago last May we learned from pretty reliable authority that one of the prominent Orders of Female Religious in that city were solicited to purchase the palatial residence erected by Wilther F. Story and which cost about a quarter of a million dollars. We now learn from a Chicago paper that subscriptions are being solicited for the purpose of assisting Archbishop Feehan to purchase the building, hence we presume that the palace of Wilther F. Story will shortly be turned to a better use than he at first intended, by making it a young ladies' seminary under charge of one of the Religious Orders.

—On the first page of this issue are two very interesting and important letters from the North American Review, a periodical that—under its present management has achieved a popularity and a circulation hitherto unknown. The Review is edited by Allen Thorndike Rice, is published at 30 Lafayette Place, New York, costs $5 a year, and is well worth the patronage of all persons who desire to peruse first-class literature presented in an attractive style. We sincerely thank the editor-in-chief for the courtesy he extended to the MONITOR in permitting us to copy these articles, which will be read with interest by all our clientage everywhere on the Pacific coast.

—October is generally considered the month for earthquakes on this coast. These peculiarities of nature, however, can be in great measure averted by prayer, but there is an infliction about to fall on the people of this coast that is worse than cholera and more disagreeable than an earthquake, as we read the other day in a New York paper that Patrick Ford, the Irish Land Leaguer of Brooklyn, is said to have promised to go to Tonia, and if he does he will have to be treated and settled with as a public enemy. Tonia is a small place in the Chamberlin Hills, in the Chamberlin Mountains, Nevada, and is about 300 miles from Sacramento. Recognizing the large population of Irish Catholics on this coast, we hope no one only the very best of material is selected for the mission, and that the expenses of an interior grande tour! be substantial. It is a matter of regret that the Land Leaguers of Tonia, Nevada, and the Land Leaguers of Dublin, Ireland, are not on speaking terms, for such one a mass in each and land, upon Rome and Ireland, would be a sight to behold. The shells are placed on a long, sloping board, and are shot down the board and struck by an automatic grip, placed under the powder magazine, and are thrown up and struck by the stated foot. It is then pressed under the wad and rammed home by a second automatic machine, the shot, on which is a card wad, and then it comes to the gunner who aims and fires the gun, which is connected with a pile—everything done with positive accuracy by automatic machinery.

The Bally Company are now making forty-five different varieties of lands to suit all cases, from manipulators to guns, and can load any large gun in less time and more accurately than can be done by the ordinary gunners, and can load any large gun in less time and more accurately than can be done by the ordinary gunners, and can load any large gun in less time and more accurately than can be done by the ordinary gunners

Farm and Home.

Girls and their Fathers.

A girl owes much to her father, even if he has not been all to her that a father ought to be. He has had to work hard, very probably, that her bread and butter should be secure. He has borne cares, anxieties, struggles, temptations, of which she can but guess, of which she can form no real conception. If he is hard and unsympathetic, she should make for him instinctively allowance for his narrow intellect or an overworked or anxious man may surely be made. And a girl never, we believe, has any conception how precious she is in her father's eyes. Rough words and cold or angry looks may seem to disprove it, but it is true, nevertheless. More, even, is a scolding, than his wife, she appeals to his protecting care; he may scold or slight her, but let any real harm threaten her and she will see that to touch her is to touch the apple of his eye. And when there is real sympathy between a man and his daughter, they may be more to each other than a father and son can generally be. A lad has his own interest to look to, his battle to fight, while a girl is free to identify herself with another. A son is very often of different politics from his father, of different tastes, different sympathies; a girl almost always imbibes those of her father. The day comes, no doubt, when her allegiance and sympathy are transferred to another, in right of a still higher claim. There is little wonder if poor dishonored, penitentiary looks sadness at first, and is slow to admit that he is the one at whom the scandal-tongue points and. It is the way of nature, and it must be so.

Holiday of a Housemaid.

Oh, dear, dear! Wonder if my mistress ever thinks I am made of flesh and blood? Five times within half an hour I have trotted up stairs to hand her things that were only four feet from her rocking-chair. Then, there's her son, Mr. George—it does seem to me that a great, able-bodied man like his needs only call a poor, tired woman up four flights of stairs to ask "What's the time of day?" Bright—his "Sally do this," and "Sally do that," till I wish I never had been baptized at all; and I might as well go either back, while I am about it, and wish I had never been born.

Now, instead of ordering me round like a drag horse, if they would only look up smiling like, now and then, or ask me how my "rheumatic" did; or say good-morning, Sally; or show some sort of interest in a fellow-creature, I could plack up a bit of heart to work for them. A kind word would ease the wheels of my tread-mill amazingly, and wouldn't cost them anything, either.

Look at my clothes, all at sixes and sevens. I mean I get a minute to sew on a string or button, except a night, and then I'm so sleepy it is as much as ever I can find the way to bed; and what a bed it is to be sure! Why, even the pigs are now and then allowed clean straw to sleep on; and as to bed clothes, the less said about them the better; my old cloak serves for a blanket, and the sheets are as thin as a charity school soup. Well, one wouldn't think it, to see all the glittering things down in the dining-room—master's span of horses, and Miss Chaw's diamond earrings, and mistress's rich dresses—I try to think it is all right but it is no use.

To-morrow is Sunday—"day of rest," I believe they call it. Humph!—more cooking to be done, more company—more confusion than on any day in the week. If I own a scull I have not heard how to take care of it for many a long day. Wonder if my master and mistress calculate to pay me for that, if I lose it? It is a question in my mind. Land of Goshen! I ain't sure I'm not a mind—there's the bell again!

Why Contagious Diseases Attack But Once.

Professor Tyndall thus endeavors to explain the immunity obtained against a second attack of a contagious disease: "One of the most extraordinary and unaccountable experiences in medicine was the immunity secured by a single attack of a comunicable disease against future attacks of the same malady. Smallpox, typhoid, or scarlatina, for example, was found as a general rule to occur only once in a lifetime of the individual, the successful passage through the disorder apparently rendering the body invulnerable. Reasoning from analogy, I have ventured to express the opinion that the rarity of second attacks of communicable disease was due to the removal from the system, by the first paroxysm, of the crop, of some ingredient necessary to the growth and propagation of the parasite."—Medical World.

A Household Where Angels Love to Come.

If there is any Heaven on earth, it is where just the right man marries just the right woman; and there is no way to be happy except with perfect liberty. We hate a man who thinks a woman should obey him. We had rather be a slave than a master. We had rather be robbed than a robber. All that we ask for ourselves is liberty, and let the man love the woman as she should be loved. As one of the old sacred books of the Hindus says, "Man is strength, woman is beauty; man is courage, woman is prudence; man is strength, and woman is wisdom; and where there is one man loving one woman, and one woman loving one man, in that house the very angels love to come and sit and sing. Where a man loves a woman she never grows old to him. Through the wrinkles of age and through the mask of time, he sees the sweet maiden face that he loved and won. And when a woman really loves a man he does not grow gray, he does not grow decrepid, he is not old; but to her he is the same gallant gentleman that was her knight and lover.

Around the House.

Never wash raisins; wipe them with a dry cloth.

Do not put salt in milk gravy till it is done or it will curdle.

Do not boil vinegar for pickles. Boil the vegetable in salt and water, drain and pour the vinegar on.

Rather jewelry that has faded can be restored to black by rubbing with a paste made of rotten stone and sweet oil.

To polish plain glass and remove slight scratches, rub the surface gently first with a clean pad of fine cotton wool, and afterward with a similar pad covered over with cotton velvet which has been charged with fine rouge. The surface will under this treatment acquire a polish of great brilliancy, quite free from any scratches.

To REMOVE STAINS.—For coffee stains try putting thick glycerine on the wrong side and washing it out with lukewarm water. For raspberry stains wash ammonia and water is the best. Stains of fruit on good table linen can be removed without injury by using the following with care. Pour boiling water on chloride of lime, in the proportion of one gallon to a quarter of a pound, bottle it, cork it well, and in using be careful not to stir it; lay the stain in this for a moment, then apply white vinegar and boil the table linen.

If you hear a morning story, don't use the principle you use when you hear a story at night, and believe it all; practice that rule in the morning, and it will reduce the number of the liars, diminish its growth, and bring back the practice of truth and honesty.

Family Fun.

A Model Wife.

Jonas was well aware that his wife was in the habit of rifling his pockets when he was asleep, but, like a wise man, he kept silence on the subject. One night, however, he awoke and caught her in the act. "Ha! I be sartained," said he, "what you be doing, my dear?"

They lady started, her cheeks flushed, and she was about to make a full confession when a bright idea entered her head. Recovering her composure she said:

"I was looking to see whether your pantaloons needed any buttons."

"They do, they do, my dear," he exclaimed, springing from bed, "I needed 'em for weeks, months, and I wondered why you didn't sew them on; but I waited, for I was sure you would get to it some time. And how kind of you to get out of bed at this time of night to attend to 'em. Say what you will, there's nothing in the world like a good wife. Let me turn up the gas a little, so you'll have all the light you want in sewing em on. Get your needle and thread and the buttons! No. Well, tell me where they are and I'll get them for you."

Mrs. Jonas proceeded to sew on the button, while her husband sat on the side of the bed and encouraged her with words of praise for her widely cute and thought for his comfort; occasionally remarking that go where he would he would always say there was nothing in the world like a good wife.

Then he went to the wardrobe and brought out several pairs of trousers, a coat, two or three old vestes, and a number of shirts, from which buttons were missing, and cheerily observed:

"While we're at it we'll make a night of it."

Two hours later, when Mrs. Jones, with a weary sigh, removed the thimble from her finger, Mr. Jonas patted her on the cheek and said:

"I say it again, my dear, say it again, that wherever I go I will say I've woman up to preclaim it from the housetops, shout it in the highways and byways, that a wife who got up in the middle of the night to sew buttons on her husband's clothes is a priceless treasure, a crown to that husband, and an ornament to her sex.

Then Mr. Jonas, chuckling to himself, lay calmly down and slept the sleep of the just.

A Complete Give-Away.

Mrs. Peterby was making a neighborly call on Mrs. Simson. While they were chatting together little Mamie Simson was seen coming towards the house with a pack age in her hand.

"Mamie is such a smart child; she is too smart for her age. I often send her to the grocery on the corner and she always brings me back the right change.

Enter Mamie, who runs to her mother and says:

"I got the coffee from the grocery, but the clerk says if you don't pay last month's bill, you can't get anything more on credit."

Love and Religion.

They stood beneath the summer skies and watched the twinkling stars in ceaseless brilliant twirl. It was a bright night the angels from the blue that they might lay their gentle hands upon the sweet music and touching every heart-string, fill the world with harmony.

"And this is love," she said, looking into his face.

"And love is religion," he continued, stopping to kiss the pretty pinkness of her cheek.

"Pantheism!" she asked naively, Episcopalian?"

"None of those, angel mine," he whispered, folding her to his throbbing heart; "none of those; it is Y-o-u-r-s!"

Devotional exercises were continued until a late hour.

An Expressive Language.

"The Chinese have got a very expressive language," said Tom Hennin, of Chicago, one morning after breakfast.

"What is there expressive about it?" asked his mother-in-law, who is an innocent lady.

"Take the word Ken for instance."

"What does Ken mean?"

"It means several things. In the first place it means a female mouth. Another meaning of Ken is gone. In short, anything that is exceedingly opening and shriving is called Ken."—Tableau.

Adam and Eve and That Apple.

How many apples did Adam and Eve eat? Some say Eve 8 and Adam a ton of 10 only. Now we figure the thing out far differently. Eve 8 and Adam 8, total 16

And yet the above figures are entirely wrong. If Eve 8 and Adam 8?, certainly the total will be 9?. Scientific man, however, on the strength of the theory that the antediluvians were a race of giants, reason something like this—Eve 8? and Adam 8?—total 162.

Wrong again; what could be clearer than, if Eve 8? and Adam 8?, the total was 8?? If Eve 8?and and Adam 8?, would not the total be 16??

I believe the following to be a fair solution: Eve 8?4 Adam, Adam 8?24 Eve—total 9936.

Still another calculation is as follows: If Eve 8?4 Adam, Adam 8?24? ellipse Eve—total 62,000. We think, however, not a sufficient quantity. For though we admit that Eve 8?4 Adam, Adam if he 8?8?24? leap Eve company—total, 8,062,056.

All wrong. Eve, when she 8?8?12 many, and probably she felt sorry for it, but her companion, in order to relieve her grief, 8?2. Therefore, when Adam 8?8?12 Eve's depressed spirits. Hence both ate 81,936,864 apples.

How It Was Born.

Away off by himself, in some humble corner of the world, sits the man who first said that the Chicago girls had big feet, looking at the immense mountain his artificial mole hill of a lie has grown into. The origin of this slander upon the fair sex of the Garden City is curious. A young lady from Chicago was about to be visited by a schoolmate from St. Louis.

"Mah," she said, "you know how sensitive Julia is, like all St. Louis girls!"

"You refer to their large feet, Eleanor?" quietly said her mother.

"Yes. And you know they look so enormous alongside of ours that I thought I'd order up a case of No. 2's from St. Louis and give them around among all the girls Julia will meet here."

"It will be a great kindness on your part, Eleanor," laughed her mother, as the noble-hearted Chicago girl did so.

When the St. Louis girl arrived at her friend's in Chicago, she exclaimed "Why dear, your girls don't have any feet at all have I" and immediately telegraphed the fact home. This is how it originated.

Study Your Business.

If we could only see ourselves as others see us how differently we should act! It helps us thus to see ourselves by which closer by other men. It helps the farmer to be a successful farmer when he sees how others by whose judgment and experience, seeing the failure of his methods, he sees how to improve, sure him to greater efficiency to better methods. He sees how others do this and that, and he knows more about farming than he does that that they are growing about more cheaply than he is, or are making substitutes for better and cheaper from cheap land and labor, he will be poorly able to keep ahead in the race, and will find himself left behind. In observing the ways of other business men a farmer will see how others do business, and learn from his life's work, and studies it thoroughly made among his own machinery and workers and study some in his business, book-keeping and prospectus, and sticks to it through good times and bad; that economy in every way is most strictly enforced, no means of any kind thrown away, no opportunity being missed, no dead stock being carried, and everything that does not pay being so promptly and immediately cut off. And he will see that he is more than this he will at least discover that in general the business man who should run his store or work shop on the majority of farms are run, would fail even so he without any business at all. No, and it is true that a large proportion of business men fail so succeed. Not all these failures are due to the want of attention to strict business methods which have become course course, and it is simply an indication that the farmer's business is an excellent and profitable one that so few men fail in it, rather than that methods are best. So that we see very few farmers succeed in other business, while a great many business men make accident and useful farmers.

The Fourth of July.

Few Americans ever entertain a doubt about the date of the signing of the Declaration of Independence being July 4, 1776, yet through the efforts and scholarship of Judge Milton Chamberlain, chief librarian of the Boston public library, it has been conclusively proven that it was not signed on that day. The true history of this memorable document Mr. Chamberlain has found to be that on the 2nd day of July, 1776, the Continental Congress at Philadelphia passed the resolution declaring that the united colonies were and of right ought to be free and independent States; and in a letter to his wife dated July 3, 1776, John Adams said: "This day will be a memorable epoch in the history of America. It ought to be commemorated as the day of deliverance by solemn acts of devotion to God Almighty." On July 4 the Declaration was read and agreed to, but was not signed. According to the direction of Congress, it was ordered to be authenticated and printed during the same afternoon and evening, and on the following day copies were sent throughout the colonies. On the 2nd of August the Declaration was signed by nearly all the members. Hon. Matthew Thornton, of New Hampshire, did not affix his name until November 4 of the same year, nor did Hon. Thos. McKean until some time 1781. Moreover, the New York members, who according to the printed journal, signed on the 4th of July, were not authorized to do so until the 9th, and the authorization was not laid before Congress until the 15th. Chase, of Maryland and Carroll, of Carrollton, were not present on the 5th of July, and Hosk, Clymer, Taylor, and Ross, of Pennsylvania, whose names appear in the journal, were not chosen as delegates until July 20. Notwithstanding the great paper was not signed on the 4th of July, that day still deserves to be commemorated above any of the others, for it was then that the sentiments and feelings of the American people were proclaimed to the world.

The Man Who Invented Matches.

According to a German paper, the inventor of lucifer matches was a political prisoner, who perfected his idea in 1833, within the walls of a State prison. Sauerneer was a native of Landgraafberg, and, when sentenced to six months imprisonment at Hohensaulng, he was fortunate enough to attract the notice and gain the favor of an old officer in charge of the prison, who had been an chemist, chemistry, allowed him to arrange a small laboratory in his cell. Sauerneer had been allowed to purchase some chemicals, and, during the definite sleeping spaces, according to which splinters of wood, with sulphur at the ends, were dipped into a chemical fluid in order to produce a flame. If the fluid was fresh the result was satisfactory, but, if it had lost its virtue after a time, there was no general disposition to continue the old fashioned square of using flint and steel. After many failures Sauerneer began to experiment with phosphorus, and had almost completed his term of imprisonment when he discovered the right mixture, and finished a match by rubbing it against the walls of his cell. On coming out of prison he commenced the manufacture of matches. Unfortunately, the absence of a patent law prevented his rights from being secured, and an Austria and other chemists analyzed the composition, imitations speedily made their appearance. In 1835 the German State prohibited the sale of the matches, considering them dangerous. When they were made in England and sent to the Continent, the expletives were whatever, but too late to be of any benefit to the inventor, who died in the workhouse of his native town, in 1857.

Strange but True.

This is one of the curious things floating about: Take a piece of paper, and upon it put its figures up to ten, forty, sixty, seventy, eighty, and ninety. Multiply it by twelve, and you will be pretty astonished at the figures 3,708, add two, and then divide by two. Subtract from the result obtained the number of your age, and, if you are a man, you do not obtain figures that you will not be likely to forget.

FAST OCEAN STEAMERS.

New the Time Crossing the Atlantic has been Shortened.

It is now nearly half a century since the steamship first navigation across the Atlantic was built in Europe. She was named the Great Western, and she was fitted out in the harbor of Bristol. She was a very ordinary sized craft, according to the present notions of naval architecture, being only 212 feet in length. She arrived safely in New York April 23, 1838. She was a wooden vessel, and was rigged with four masts. Her rates for passage were 40 guineas or $210, and $25 or $125, were charged per ton for freight. Her average passage from Bristol to New York was sixteen days, and one hour, and her homeward passage was accomplished in thirteen days and half an hour. The success of this voyage was the impetus to London and Liverpool capitalists to establish regular lines of mail steamers to ply between the English ports and the United States. Mr. Cunard of Liverpool was one of the principals in these schemes and he made a tender to the British Government to enter into treaties on condition he had the contract for carrying the mails. His tender was accepted, and immediately he gave orders for four new steamers, specially designed for this trade. They were built on the Clyde, and were some of the first to steer the ship-building interest in that port, which has since grown so famous in that trade. In the summer of 1840 the steamships were started on her first trip across the Atlantic, and very soon afterwards a regular service was established between Liverpool and Halifax. In the year 1845 the Great Britain was launched as the first screw steamer, and she was a wonderful craft in that time.

In 1847, after the Great Western started trips across the ocean, British built steamers had a monopoly, but in 1847 an American ship, named the Washington, had a run against the Britannia, but was beaten by two days in the length of passage. In May, 1850, the Europa, the first steamship the Collins line, arrived in Liverpool. She was 251 feet in length and 2,226 tons, and her favorite Commander of that time was the Asia. Was 266 feet in length and 2,226 tons tonnage. The result of running between Liverpool and New York for the next twelve months gave the Cunarder an average of twelve days, six hours and forty-one minutes out, and ten days, seventeen hours and thirty minutes home, while the Collins line average sixteen days fifteen hours and two minutes out, and eleven days home.

Short passages were not to stop here. The Canadians bought the Oregon and added the Cambria. Arrangements were made for the Cunarders to carry the mail in August of last year.

In May of this year, the new steamship Etoria crossed in seven days, two hours and fifty minutes, and made the voyage eastward in six days, twelve hours and thirty-two minutes. On August 2 she finished her fourth voyage to New York, having crossed in six days, five hours and forty-four minutes.

The following is a table of the time of Etoria's voyages:

Westward—	d.	h.	m.	Eastward—	d.	h.	m.

Swallowing Cows.

"Swallowed fifteen cows!" said Herrie in astonishment, looking from his play. Her care had caught the words in a corner of her mind, and she spoke up.

"Yes," answered her brother, "he swallowed them all up."

"Jonah Bloom, you don't think he swallowed the little cows!" said Herrie.

"He sold them and bought whiskey and beer to pay the money," explained her Aunt Kate.

"Why, that was if I I see now. Well, it's funny."

"No, not funny, dear, but sad," said Aunt Kate. "You had a wife and two little children, and before he took to drinking he sold the milk from fifteen cows and bought them food and clothing. But now, having swallowed the cows (as we were saying), his wife and children go hungry and cold, and he, a poor miserable drunkard, is in the alms-house. Isn't it dreadful to think of?"

The children looked very sober.

"You'll never catch me swallowing fifteen cows, my one either," said Herrie, very positively.

"I don't mean to do that," replied Aunt Kate. "The man we are talking about was only a little boy like you, with a healthy appetite for food and clothing, and he was eating very fifteen cows, fetch him one each, which he never minded his food. But you see what he came to at last. He said I'll be temperate, I will not touch a beer, or a little wine at parties now and then. This strong drink is just sweet, and gave him an unnatural thirst which only strengthened with every drink. Beer and beer came whiskey rum and brandy, and he could not stop, and he drank, the thirst increased, until he became a confirmed drunkard. No, you see, George, that no man, such a thing he never minded his food. But you see what he came to at last. He said I'll be temperate, I will not touch a beer, or a little wine at parties now and then. This strong drink is just sweet, and gave him an unnatural thirst which only strengthened with every drink. Beer and beer came whiskey rum and brandy, and he could not stop, and he drank, the thirst increased, until he became a confirmed drunkard. No, you see, George, that no man, such a thing he never minded his food. Now, sonnie, that is too bad!" exclaim ed George. "You ought to know that I will not."

Schoolboys and thousands of little boys might once have said, "Oh, I can drink as much as any man." Now, George, you know that you are drinking.

"What is that, sonnie?" asked the boy, looking up with surprise.

"It is the way of total abstinence, as we call it—the way of taking for boys and men. If you never drank a drop of intoxicating liquor you will never be a drunkard. If you depart from this rule, no man can tell to how low a depth of wretchedness and degradation you may fall. The man drunkard in the land was once a pure and innocent boy."

African Ants.

Among the luxuries of travel in Western Africa, armies of ants and venomous flies may be safely reckoned. Crocodiles, scorpions and serpents are such commonplaces in Southern Africa that it is not worth while to dwell upon them.

The bush-ticks are not so much a terrible plague. They travel, we grieved, night and day, in serried ranks, in vast numbers, and gorgeously fly before the ants. The elephant is the only creature that can offer a serious resistance to the ants, and even he, if he be in a state of repose, will be driven from his lair, or, if he be in a state of repose, will be driven from his lair, or, if he be in eight, rather pound-at-home, till he has to come out to get his food. The ants have the same sense of the elephant, and they do not attack him. They know that he is too big for them, and they know that he is too big for them, and they know that he is too big for them, and they

RECEPTION OF ARCHBISHOP WALSH.

of the multitude would allow the Town Clerk to read the address of the municipality. And none but those in the immediate vicinity of the Archbishop could hear what he said in reply. The Sun has already informed the readers of the Monitor of his sentiments in the Town Council as well as among the upper classes of the Dublin Catholics regarding Dr. Walsh's election. His words, henceforth, will help to silence all who either question his perfect devotion to Ireland or his perfect discharge of his duty as a Bishop. They justify the choice of his clergy and people, the confidence of the Irish nation, and the selection of the Sovereign Pontiff.

A people claiming the same and dignity of a nation must prove not merely by words, but still more by the acts of its public men, that it has the self-restraint which, especially in nations where religious feeling comes into play, has proved with the most delicate success, that it could never of disregard for the sacred obligations of a man who assumed the sacred office of Bishop. Without neediness of any address has enhanced only, I believe, to more than a full and adequate fidelity with the wishes expressed in its closing address.

Who can it is no new theory of to-day or yesterday, but a settled and deeply rooted one which that for a remedy of the many grievances for the general of which the people of this island have so long labored with but partial success, there is but one effective remedy, and that the union of Ireland of that right of self-government which is the birthright of a high a century of which we are so thankful as we that the remote and the infancy can direction. Irrefutable, this, which fell from the lips of Dr. Walsh and O'Connell has once more been boldly applied. And I say that it may never again be twice said the right of Ireland is recognized to have be we have been left to the mercy of and by the legally and constitutionally chosen representatives of the Irish people.

You can hardly picture to yourself the effect of those words on all who heard them. Their import was repeated by one to another inside and outside the station. The railway officials had made no preparations, taken no precautions to prevent any pass on to that goal. Everywhere, upon the green and of Ireland, there is hurry and haste, prepared for the political news. Not brought by the usurpers of past debate, both Whigs and Tories are so prepared unknowing to see the day of Nationalism. They cannot, however, come to agree, consequently, their hopes of a union are frustrated, and they are now determined to run their candidates independent of each other. If the two parties hold out to the resolution which they have, I am informed, passed with regard to South Derry, for early meetings, Mr. Parnell's nominee will be easily unhorsed in that contest. [CORRESPONDENT.]

Dear Sir—As the year advances bringing us nearer the anniversary of Michael Davitt, the cause of Irish Nationality continues to make rapid strides. And, although the English Press cries out "Impossible" at the Parnellite Party's demands of Mr. Parnell for a Native Parliament, in College Green, on day passes than his records have not worked themselves more near to that goal. Everywhere, upon the green sod of Ireland, there is hurry and haste, prepared for the political news. THE WEEK'S NEWS —FROM— IRELAND.

IRISH NEWS BY MAIL.

Antrim.—The unfortunate Tories of Ulster must be in a desperate state when they had to appeal to such a man as Mr. Dillon to help them in their contest. This statesman has been in Belfast, and employs his time in abusing Home Rule, to the delight of his friends, who appear to be blankly unaware of Mr. Jackin's previous history.

On Sept. 2, a splendid National demonstration was held in Dr. Mark Hall, Belfast. The hall was densely crowded, and a short time after the opening of the doors it was difficult, if not impossible, to obtain even standing room. A number of ladies were present, amongst whom were Miss Stephens and Biggar, M.P. Mr. Biggar, on their entrance, received a tremendous cheer, the entire audience cheering and waving their hats for some minutes. Among those present were Very Rev. Dr. Henry, President of St. Malachy's College; Very Rev. John Gentry, Dean, &c.; Rev. M. Magee, C.C., St. Peter's; Rev. D. McAvoy, C.C., St. Joseph's; Rev. Mr. Cassidy, Newry; Alexander Dunlopp, M. D., J. P., Edward Hughes, J. P.; Andrew McGlynn, M. J. O'Leary, W. J. McCormack, St. Malachy's College; John Griffiths, Dr. Mc. Donnell, Dr. Kennedy, Dr. Kelly, Dr. Fitzsimons, Dr. Mc. Donnell, Dr. Kennedy, Dr. Kelly, Dr. Fitzsimons, J. Mc. C. O'Neill, accompanied by Mr. Thomas M. Meeleck, the Hon. T. M. Magee, Q. C. St. Peter's was called to the chair.

Cavan.—The farmers of Cavan were fortunate in fixing the period for their county meeting so early, when they were sure of having the benefit of Mr. Biggar's presence. Mr. Biggar's speech was particularly complied with on consideration of the position created by the passing of the Land Purchase Act, and his advice was to be summed up in a couple of sentences. As men of sense, his constituents need not be referred from availing themselves of the Act by any consideration. They need not sacrifice their existence of loyalty and rent before entering into a contest with landlords, for the sake of their individual interest, and they must also take care of their neighbors, their clergy, and their country. Above all, they must not undertake to pay what they thought they should not pay, for the sake of being in fashion with an irrelievable taskmaster—the State. Another speaker, the Rev. John Rogers, P. P. Crossroughan, took up the handy topic of the important question of how to meet the present difficulties. The great cry of the hour is how are we to meet the November rents? Mr. Carroll was selected by 8 votes to 5.

A meeting was held in Ballyjamesduff, which was attended by a large concourse of people, on Sunday, the 27th ult., when it was decided to hold a public meeting on Sunday, the 11th of October, at which Mr. Biggar, M.P., and Mr. J. Lane, T.C., Cork, will be expected to address the people on the subject of the Land Question.

Dublin.—United Ireland says: "The true formation of Sarsfield street into O'Connell street is likely to be accomplished. The Irish people have definitely decided upon the name, and the Corporation will be asked to give their assent. Mr. Moore, Hophouse, wax-chandler, lower O'Connell-street, has in his hands a memorial which will be remembered throughout the length and breadth of Ireland. We would advise him and all our friends to send in order to say from the country, that the Corporation of Dublin, unanimously assembled, Thomas Sexton, Esq., Lord Mayor, on their entrance, received a tremendous cheer, the entire audience cheering and waving their hats for some minutes. Among those present were Very Rev. Dr. Henry, President of St. Malachy's College; Very Rev. John Gentry, Dean, &c.; Rev. M. Magee, C.C., St. Peter's; Rev. D. McAvoy, C.C., St. Joseph's; Rev. Mr. Cassidy, Newry; Alexander Dunlopp, M. D., J. P., Edward Hughes, J. P.; Andrew McGlynn, M. J. O'Leary, W. J. McCormack, St. Malachy's College; John Griffiths, Dr. Mc. Donnell, Dr. Kennedy, Dr. Kelly, Dr. Fitzsimons, J. Mc. C. O'Neill, accompanied by Mr. Thomas M. Meeleck, the Hon. T. M. Magee, Q. C. St. Peter's was called to the chair.

Limerick.—A meeting of the local branch of the Irish National League, held in the Town Hall, Bruff, on Sunday, the 27th ult., Mr. Lane in the chair, which was proposed by Alderman Fitzgerald, and seconded by Mr. Lane, T.C., Cork, was unanimously adopted. The following resolutions were proposed by Mr. Sexton, and to maintain an appearance of unity, and to be prepared for the worst, we must stand up to the enemy

THE MOST HOLY ROSARY.

(The month of October being devoted to the Most Holy Rosary, we take great pleasure in re-publishing the following appropriate and excellent poem written by Miss Harriet Mulholland Rand, and published in her interesting volume entitled "Beside the Western Sea.—Ed. Monitor.)

O royal rosé, that hast woven lands
Like a great girdle, round our world!
A lily-shaped, sweetly bid
Thou art—a lily-shaped in sweet and
O rose-wreath, twining, pure and fair,
Around the holy height of Calvary!
Where love's bright wount bathe and
The pilgrim-souls that bath sweetness
Bless garland! on each shining bead
A soul is saved—a soul is freed
The little beads, thy lovely leaves,
Are fair as every sacred gem;
I see her crowned with Mercy's
Hallow by enchanted, "full of grace!"
Her gentle footsteps, of Mother Church that Behold the handmaid of the Lord!
I catch the gleam of angel wings;
Again their Christmas carol sings,
As on that eve when love hath
The history of the God made man.
I follow all that sanctified her life,
Overshaded by Mary's tender care;
I see her joining hands in prayer
His life youth made a Lent Rosaries,
Her Son, the Man of Sorrows! and
A prayer into my every bead,
But shadows fall on Calvary
Lo! him who prayed in Gethsemane!
When o'er the Victim's spirit flow
The mighty waves of human pain,
And in His shrinkin heart is heard
The cry of human agony!
The night of darkness shades the moon,
The moaned waves like waves of
And mortals throng, with thirst and Around the Cross, the Crucified!
Nailed to His throne, the Martyr-King
Hangs, bleeding, 'twixt the skies
"God pardon! His enemies!" lo!
On the fixed altar of the cross!
Lo, yield to death, the Victim-Lamb!
A bodied take on every bead.

But! ye upon that weary way
Journey! Pilgrims! Wearied
The tomb is rent, the sight is gone,
And hospitably breathe the Paradise
I see the risen Saviour stand
Beside the Magdalen! Mary! hand!
Lo! the Sacred Heart!
The flock still claims the Shepherd's care,
Till His mission is fulfilled
Of comfort blest, and strength from heaven
Then, from the Mount of Olivet
A matchless flood of glory pours.
Lo! a prize is you! Love's labor ends!
The Victor to His throne ascends!
The angels announce the lost,
For, lo! the Saviour of Pentecost!
With tongues of flame and zeal
Behold the promised Paraclete!
Bright visions descend, and Unmoved by wisdom's lost of light,
Lo! the Christian pilgrimage must be
The Inheritance of Children.
The Mother-Mother, full of grace
Again, I press her sacredly
She's or a Saviour's childhood
And to Hi cross unfaltering
She is seek some here her part!
The mantle of holy prayer
Now, in that Saviour's triumph
The Mother claims her royal
Lo, glorious thrills the angel
Now rapture crowds the earth's
The pale is past! the Bliss is Lo! the Immaculate Mary!
And in! the Immaculate of the Resolves her radiant reward,
Lo! the Mother of Christ! the love
The pastime crown is gleaming
And in, 'mid royal prize, I read
A glorious table on every bead.
O wonderous pilgrim! lo
The visions of the Rosary!
To hear the spirits of those that Redemption's story from the beads
To inspire, and by holy dreams,
Where Israel's Hly shade the
To wend the powerful pathos of
To mount on the mystic ladder
Lo! the Rosary! the
That linketh in the better land!

LINES

Written on Reading the Letter of Archbishop Alemany to Last Week's Monitor.

Who have deserted Mother Church and in exile
Look upon that Holy Pope commanding from
his prison
Wa think of you and we pray for you who exiled us for years.
And, by your wisdom, zeal and salutly words
restore us all to our fears;
Yes, we pray for you, our Pastors, who tender shepherds
And in our poor and humble hearts be immortal
we will treasure.
We have not yet forgotten you and with God's and shall never
Until time tender thread of life Its death are
to sever,
Long years ago when our good State was not as latest growing
Thy kindly words of good advice you never ceased bestowing.
We wished to go to manhood growing and
never ceased to crave,
The glorious cross of Mother Church that
might live and flourish,
You and our prayers, oh, please one! that you
might be guided
Thy wisdom's careful rule where thy Master
was divided.
To life heavenly home of bliss where's thy life
be ended
To where eternal peace and joy with happiness
are blended—
Oh, gladly, gladly do we great thy single wish,
but pray
That many years may yet elapse on you are called away.

With so much love and high esteem for those who long years past of blest contact be yours
to see the Church
To single with thy friends in life Saints Dominic and Thomas.

A True Story of Real Life.

"Now you are not a bit afraid, Mollie?"
"Afraid—of what? I'm not a baby."
"No, indeed, you're a hearty—much baby."
"And if I've travelled all the way from Cincinnati to New York by myself, I don't know why I ought to be afraid to come to London."
"Yes, but this isn't America, you know and girls are so silly. I don't see what on earth I ever consented to let you get your head out of the window too for and get it knocked off Mem, don't be disgusted. I'm telling you the truth, I tell you, I'm afraid maybe my father might cut up about my leaving you, but I am't let this chance fly choosing sly, and the girls won't wait.
Hello! here comes the train. First stop to London, guard. Nobody in the compartment!
All right, Polly, jump in. Make my and my brother giving me a hug and a

The door slammed, and I was going to London all alone. When it opened again a man rushed in just after—gay, big, and fishing tackle.
"I just in time, guard!
"Ay, ay, sir.
"Here's a shilling for your trouble. All alone sir?"
"Me, sir; a young lady, sir.
This time the door slammed securely,
the key was turned and the guard disappeared.
It was 6 30 o'clock. A damp, dull afternoon. I look at myself in the little mirror opposite. It reflected a tall, brown-eyed, brown haired girl, with a pretty complexion, and neat travelling dress. A very young person, sightseen at best, and a very strong and healthy one. We, my brother and I had been to Warwick, Stratford, &c., and at the last moment he received a telegram from college mates bidding him to meet them in the North; they had formed a shooting party which was to start the next day. My mother was in London, on Sabbaths, rather than disturb his pleasure trip, that I return to her alone. The train was going at full speed—fifty miles per hour. I could scarcely, in the dim twilight of the December day, distinguish the rapidly moving trees and houses as we skirted
Suddenly a little—a little—open—my companion. He was a tall, rawboned man, with gray eyes and long red hair, heavy whiskers covered his face. He wore a shooting jacket and a loose flannel blouse.
He fixed his eyes on me for five minutes without speaking. At a certain station the guard, cap gnaed that was, got out and peered at the window. I saw another official get on. Our guard vanished his cap and boarded an out-going train. We started off with renewed rapidity. I was feeling almost lonely and the slightest degree embarrassed by my close proximity to my amiable companion, when he got up from his seat, opened his travelling bag, took out a pair of shears, and pulling his hand on my shoulder, said—
"I want you to cut my hair!"
"Cut your hair?" I cried too amazed to be alarmed. "Are you crazy! Cut your hair?"
"Yes, cut my hair immediately."
"I will not!" I exclaimed. "Guard, guard, come to me; this man is crazy!"
"Hush to the door; it was locked, of course,
and the guard I knew and who knew us, was miles away. Hush! I tell you for the last time—"
"It is useless to make a disturbance," said the fellow. "I intend that you shall cut my hair! If you do not I will kill you —take your choice."
Trembling I took the shears.
"Walk, But I never stirred my neck;
there. Thanks, very much. Now, carefully."
For half an hour I cut away; it had grown quite dark, only the dim light of the railroad lamp illuminated the compartment.
"Left off," he asked, producing his glass and peering at the cropped crown.
"Yes."
"Not bad for a beginner. Now, for my whiskers. I can't shave you one, for my razor is broken."
For the first time I saw this member hang hughes at his side.
"But I will not!" I screamed: "I will not."
"Yes, you will," said my persector.
"You will do just what I tell you. Kneel down here, in front of me, and cut my beard."
"I will not, I will not."
"Very well." And he advanced towards me.
Instantly I was on my knees, cutting away at the forest of undergrowth.
"As close as you can, my dear. You will find the shears sharp. I don't believe you've left a hair on my head."
This job took me longer to do than my previous one. The beard was very stiff horn, and Monsieur very particular.
"All end, I'm sure," he said presently. "All my long love locks and lady killers! But necessity—drawing a sigh—" cruel necessity knows no law."
He threw me kiss with the tips of his horney fingers.
"I shall always dub you cruel necessity in my own mind."
His face being so clean shaven as my implement allowed, he bid me turn my back
"I will not! Oh, I will not, I will."
"You will turn your back immediately said my tormentor. "But first help me to adjust my arm in this sling."
I had forgotten that I meekly tore the sling on his brow, but he did not quiver.
"Now, take that back and peep under my eyes and shadow my eye brows
I obeyed, but as you would do your own, my dear, were you dressing for a ball.
I trembled. "The madman!" I whispered below my breath, "oh, the madman!
But I did as was bid. One faltering look
I ran to the door and I was bound tight.
"Now look out of the window. Mind, if you see anybody move than pretty hint bond, on my honor as a gentleman, I must take my revenge."
For twenty minutes (or was it a hundred years?) I sat gazing into the darkness with a sick. The lightning rapidity of the train, as we rushed along, made a leap through the darkness.
I thought of my mother and my home,
and, poor child, of my girlish sin and seplignance. I was too frightened then to cry or attempt to make my reservation.
"Look, my pretty dove," said a gay voice.
I heard the window open, and a black bonnet fall. Was I dreaming or not?
There, under the light of the little oil lamp, on a bench in the left hand, with demoniac eyes and reversional air, was a young person, in the full flowing vestment of a fellow of a Jesuit college.
Oh, gladly, gladly do we great thy single wish,
but pray
That many years may yet elapse on you are called away.

Who have deserted Mother Church and in exile
Look upon that Holy Pope commanding from
his prison
Wa think of you and we pray for you who exiled
us for years.
And, by your wisdom, zeal and salutly words
restore us all to our fears;
Yes, we pray for you, our Pastors, who
tender shepherds
And in our poor and humble hearts be immortal
we will treasure.
We have not yet forgotten you and with God's
and shall never
Until time tender thread of life Its death are
to sever,
Long years ago when our good State was not as latest growing
Thy kindly words of good advice you never ceased bestowing.
We wished to go to manhood growing and
never ceased to crave,
The glorious cross of Mother Church that
might live and flourish,
You and our prayers, oh, please one! that you
might be guided
Thy wisdom's careful rule where thy Master
was divided.
To life heavenly home of bliss where's thy life
be ended
To where eternal peace and joy with happiness
are blended—
Oh, gladly, gladly do we great thy single wish,
but pray
That many years may yet elapse on you are called away.

With so much love and high esteem for those who long years past of blest contact be yours
to see the Church
To single with thy friends in life Saints Dominic
and Thomas.

"Now you are not a bit afraid, Mollie?"
"Afraid—of what? I'm not a baby."
"No, indeed, you're a hearty—much

know why I ought to be afraid to come
to London."
"Yes, but this isn't America, you know

earth I ever consented to let you get your head out

maybe my father might cut up about my

Hello! here comes the train. First stop to London, guard. Nobody in the compartment!
All right, Polly, jump in. Make my peace with mother if she is vexed. Tra', la, la, and my brother giving me a hug and a kiss.
The door slammed, and I was going to London all alone. When it opened again a man rushed in just after—gay, big, and fishing tackle.
"I just in time, guard!
"Ay, ay, sir.
"Here's a shilling for your trouble. All alone sir?"
"Me, sir; a young lady, sir.
This time the door slammed securely,
the key was turned and the guard disappeared.

GETTING AHEAD OF GHOSTS.

Various Superstitions of Various People Concerning the Return of Spirits.

The favorite "beat" of the ghost is usually the spot where he died. Hence, in order to keep him at least from the house, the Celtic carry a sack man out into the open air to die and the Maoris used to remove the sick into sheds. If a Kaffir or a Malay dies before he could be carried out the house was fired and deserted. There are traces in Greece, Rome and China of the custom of carrying dying persons into the open air.

But in case the ghost should, despite of these precautions, make his way back from the grave, steps were taken to barricade the house against him. Thus, in some parts of Russia and East Prussia an axe or a hook is laid on the threshold or a knife is hung over a door, and in Germany as soon as the coffin is carried out of the house all the doors and windows are shut, whereas, so long as the body is still in the house, the windows (said superstitious the doors), are left constantly open to allow the soul to escape. In some parts of England every bolt and lock in the house is unfastened so that the ghost of the departed man may fly freely away

But if primitive men knew how to bolly, they also knew how to outwit the ghost. For example, a ghost can only find his way back to the house by the way by which he left it. This little weakness did not escape the vigilance of our ancestors and they took their measures accordingly. The coffin was carried out of the house, not by the door, but by a hole made in the wall, and, lest this hole should be carefully stopped up as soon as the body had been passed through it, so that when the ghost strolled quietly back from the grave, he found to his surprise that there was no thoroughfare. The credit of this ingenious device is shared equally by Greenlanders, Hottentots, Berbermen, Samoides, Ojibways, Algonkins, Laconians, Hottentots, Tibetans, Siamese, Chinese, and Fijians. These special openings, or "doors of the dead," as still to be seen in a village near Amsterdam and they were common in Etruria and in central Italy, in Perugia and Asisi. A trace of the same custom survive in Thuringen, where it is thought lucky to leave a door in a house that has hanged will return to the house if the body be not taken out by a window instead of the door.

The Siamese not content with carrying the dead man out by a special opening, endeavor to make assurance doubly sure by making him go three times round the house at full speed—a proceeding well calculated to bewilder the poor soul in the coffin. The Arecanians adopt the plan of strewing ashes behind the corpse as it is being borne to the grave, in order that the ghost may not be able to find his way back.—Contemporary Review.

Telegraph Blunders.

From the fact that the telegraph does such magical work for us day by day, its errors are apt to be forgotten in our admiration of its celerity and general accuracy. Yet when the wires are affected by storms, or are clerk by carelessness, the telegraph makes dreadful blunders. In one case the mere misplacing of a point was like to have embroiled two commercial firms into a law-suit. The message was this: A message was sent—"You can have the hundred pieces at sixteen and nine. Thousand more at same rate." As delivered in London it read—"You can have the hundred pieces at sixteen, and nine thousand more at same rate," on which understanding or misunderstanding, the goods were ordered. At a meeting of the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Hornby, M.P., complaining of the irregularity and incorrectness of the Anglo-Indian telegraph, instances a message which, when delivered in Calcutta, read—"Cholera is raging in Bombay. Mortality is very great. Your friends are all well." In another case, a husband, on receiving a telegram from his wife at home, received, on opening it, the startling announcement—"Your wife had a boa for twins this morning. A well-known physician being ill at Toronto, the message was sent to his wife—"Dr. Jones is very ill—worse." The family got it, "Mr. Brown is very ill—worse." and in once sent on a special train for his remains. In another case, a gentleman who had ordered his pig to swain him a pair of pigeons, received a telegram to the effect that the swain was undersood from his pigeons to require the attendance of his pig-doctor. The following story was told me by a clergyman in Philadelphia. A preacher, who had accepted a call to a pastoral charge in a Western State, was prevented from starting on the day appointed by reason of the want of a quorum to proceed with his coffin. A telegram was accordingly despatched to the deacons—"Presbytery lacks a quorum to ordain." Before three words reached their destination they got themselves twisted into the following extraordinary shape—"Presbytery lacked a quorum to Adam." The deacons, on receipt of this message, were utterly baffled—and made nothing of it; but, after long consultation, came to the conclusion that their new minister had got married, and that this was his facetious way of making them aware of the fact. They accordingly took the proper steps, and provided lodgings for the bride and bridegroom. Reference had been made to the telegraphic service by Bryan Longworthy and India. In no one all circumstance considered, wrought with more disastrous effect, but for some months, at first, the disputants having to pass through the hands of foreign clerks, or rather, in a state of confusion sufficiently tedious to drive the wind and to pay for them and for not required to make sense of them. The following, which appeared in the Boston Gazette for two weeks after the opening of the line, is worth preserving—"It is due to the new line of communication," says the Gazette, "that we should acknowledge in our overland summary the considerable service it has rendered to India as a means of transmitting public news, and private advice. The following telegram, printed as received, speak for themselves. They are Reuter's:

It would be interesting to know what the Boston Gazette made of these remarkable announcements.

A four percent of Broome county, N. Y., who lost his arm at a rich iron ore pass ago, has just had a verdict for $1,000 against the company for injuries received on the ground that he situated for brakes of cars, in consequence of which he lost sight to enter his own living.

The depression of the coal trade in South Wales is so serious that over 40,000 men are affected by it. "GONE ON BEFORE."

The Magic Influence and Power of the Name of Mother.

The other day, explains a correspondent in a current number of one of the monthly magazines, I was walking with an old man, when he took his watch from his pocket and, scanning its dial, said

"Eleven o'clock, but it is time I was home with mother.

"Have you a mother living?" I said it in great surprise, for he was past 70, and his white locks and furrowed face seemed to the word sound strange, but dearer, I thought, than I had ever heard it before.

"No. Oh, no!" said the old man. "My own mother died fifty years ago. meant the mother of the boys."

"And who are the boys?" I asked

"Why, of course you don't remember them—I expect you never knew them—for I never met you until to-day. There's John and William and Thomas and Martin and Matthew. Matthew is the baby, as though he does not look like one now, for he is nearly 40, and has a large beard. It is their mother I mean."

"Your good old wife!" I asked.

"Yes," he replied. "Yes, she is mother to the boys, and I have called her mother for more than fifty years. But you must excuse me, sir, for it is time I should be home with mother. I promised my wife and see her, for she is the sweetest, prettiest old woman you will ever have a chance to see. She was a little girl when I first saw her, and then she was then. Come along and see mother, sir, and she will be glad to see the door of her comfortable home, and when we come in the gate, I'll sing out to her to come to us, and Matthew said.

"Father, mother has not seen you here, and can't say a word. Martin has gone for the doctor

"Let you!" and the old man pushing by Matthew. "Mother must have the doctor—I asked she same—for mother is not able to withstand another stroke of palsy. Come along, sir, and see—Mary, I'm back, beckoning to me, and I followed him as he hurried into the house where lay his wife.

The good old woman was indeed beautiful. Around her face clustered a lovely growth of white hair that she had let down like an angel with a halo of light radiating from her noble brow. Her mouth was drawn out of its natural shape by the paralytic contortion of her face, and her keenly bright eyes looked upsteamy-fearless, but when the old man came before her pure old eyes and, bending softly above her, whispered—"Mother, I am here," a smile strangled to play upon the half paralyzed lips, and her eyes brightened and looked upon him as the old man who had been her companion since they were a boy and girl, and it seemed to me that there was some endearing name for him also, she struggled to speak, but her tongue had lost its cunning and move to the roof of her mouth. The old man bent lower and imprinted a kiss upon the twitching lips, and they made an effort to speak again, but the motion gave pain, and the poor dear lay quietly on her bed, and the old man kneeled beside her and prayed.

"Mother, do you know us?

"Yes, I know you all, and the good old man placed his hands upon her brow, where the white hair lay in a thick mat, and blessed her, and the tears came in his big eyes and trickled along the furrows which the years of care had cut in his cheek, and the sons wept, and, I, who had never wept since I was a little boy, felt the tears from them and shed tears for mother

THE MONITOR.

TWENTY-NINTH YEAR OF PUBLICATION.

The MONITOR has the largest circulation of any Religious Paper published on the Pacific Coast.

WEDNESDAY OCTOBER 7, 1885.

Editorial Notes.

The large Protestant element that is dissatisfied with the lately "revised" bible, is calling out for another "revised" version! And thus these thoughtless people will go on tinkering at the sacred word of God until they make a regular crazy quilt out of the bible, so that any fool who wants to find an excuse for denying God has only to consult some "revised" bible in order to get authority for doing so!

—It is safe to presume that the recent decree of the Pope ordaining the daily recitation of the Rosary of the Most Blessed Virgin will cause a fresh burst of indignation from Protestant preachers who protest far more against the Mother of God than they do against the Protestant immorality of our day. Hatred of the Blessed Virgin is one of the most decisive marks by which the world may discern the disciples of Belphegor.

—The cholera seems to be spreading with alarming rapidity all over the world. At present it is raging in Spain, Italy, China and Japan, with premonitory symptoms of the presence of the dreaded scourge in other parts of the world. Such warnings are oftentimes sent to us in order that we may "put our house in order" so that death may not come on us suddenly—like a thief in the night—and find us unprepared for that certain passage from this world into the world to come.

—The American Catholic Prelates who went to Rome to decidate the decrees of the late Plenary Council have returned, and on the 10th ult., the Holy Father gave his approbation to the work of the Bishops as revised. What changes have been made in the decrees since they passed out of the hands of Secretary Corcoran and into those of the Congregation of the Council no one can tell. The volume will soon be published and then the world will be wiser than it is now.

—A conference of Mormons—or Latter-Day Saints as they call themselves in England—was recently held in London, at which a high tribute was rather unintentionally paid to the virtue of Irish men and women. There were Mormon delegates present from Norway, Sweden, Holland and Germany, who all spoke hopefully of the result of missionary labors. Mr. Penrose, of Salt Lake City, boasted that Mormonism was spreading in England, Scotland and Wales, but regretted that the doctrine was obtaining no foothold in Ireland. Lous lou!

—Archbishop Ryan of Philadelphia, has received up to date, as trustee of the Catholic institutions of the diocese, $750,000 under the will of the late Francis A. Drexel, Catholic citizen which he named. The executors by the will were given a year in which to settle the estate affairs. Government by those in position to know that Mr. Drexel's estate will amount to $10,000,000.

—After examining the year books of the different Protestant sects, the New York Independent arrives at the disheartening conclusion that "in spite of all that has been written to prove that the Gospel is making production advances among men, a painfully small number of men and women is added to the Lord by confession." But what can we Protestants make of conclusion? Assuredly if a man can make his own system of religious belief he ought to be able to shrive himself of his sins without any help from a powerless preacher!

—As a souvenir of the 29th volume of the MONITOR, we furnish our readers this week with a supplement containing some beautiful prayers and aspirations recently indulgenced by our Holy Father Pope Leo XIII. If any calous Missionaries, Religious or Lady Sodalists evince disgust at these prayers for free distribution among Catholic children or adults, we will send as many copies as may be desired any time during the present month. We hope every Catholic who receives these prayers will place them in his or her bed room and recite them daily, and thus "lay up treasures in heaven."

—The American Consul at Nice has written a lengthy communication to the Government, in which he advises that some action be taken by Congress to put a stop to the practice of Frenchmen coming to this country and marrying American wives to repudiate them the moment they return to France. We hope that if our Government does anything in this matter it will first try and stop the Home Guard of husbands from perpetrating the villainy complained of. A great charity like this should most certainly begin at home, and Washington City would make a most excellent starting point for such a needed reformation!

—Our Holy Father, Pope Leo XIII. has been graciously pleased to impart his Apostolic Benediction, for the second time, to Mr. James J. Treacy, author of "Tributes of Protestant Writers to the Truth and Beauty of Catholicity," and to show his high appreciation of the "Tributes" and "Catholic Flowers from Protestant Gardens," His Holiness has also designed to honor Mr. Treacy with the gift of an exquisitely executed cameo representing St. Joseph and the Infant Saviour, the work of a distinguished Roman artist. It says the Philadelphia Standard.

—The city of Minneapolis has a curious provision in its law relating to the liquor traffic which we would like to see an introduction into every city and town in California. Besides charging a license fee of $500, the law makes not certain petrol limits, including the business area of the city, within which all the saloons there must be situated, and where they can be kept under close police inspection. As to the rest of the city, including all the main residence portions of the city, where probably nine-tenths of the inhabitants have their homes, absolute saloon prohibition prevails, and is rigidly enforced.

—Were it not for the tongue-wagging of a few pantaloomed females, the "woman's rights" movement would die out in a year. Even in Boston—which is supposed to be the cradle of all the male and female "cranks" in the country—at a recent school election there were only 1,543 votes cast by female suffragists out of a total population of married women numbering 60,000. It seems, therefore, that it is only a few scolding hens in the ballot-box barnyard of the female portion of the American community, who keep a constant "cluck-cluck" concerning the "rights" which a vast majority of the more sensible ladies of the land have no desire whatever for.

—"The Green above the Red" seems to be very popular in Ireland just at present. The Dublin Nation chronicles the pleasing intelligence that "the contract for supplying green flags to the public buildings of Dublin promises to yield a handsome profit to somebody in the near future. It is only quite recently that the national emblem was unfurled to the breeze from the flag-staff of the City Hall, and on another day a new green banner was hoisted for the first time over the Mansion House. The next place where we expect to see this ubiquitous emblem flying is over Dublin Castle; but that institution must be thoroughly cleansed and disinfected first. Otherwise our cherished green flag might run the danger of being irretrievably sullied."

—The "British Canadians" are beginning themselves together against the French Canadians, and have formed an anti French Leagues. These British Canadians are composed of Scotch and English emigrants and their sons, who entertain a hostile feeling against all that do not believe like them in worshipping the occupant of the British throne. The Irish a few years ago exposed the weakness and cowardice of these Orangemen, and since then they have fallen into contempt by many of their own creed who had previously supported them. The late political disturbances in Canada have drawn the Irish and French nearer to each other and they bear their union in the event of another outbreak. This may recur any day in the lower provinces, and leave the anti French Leagues.

—Father Phelan of the St. Louis Watchman has a way of saying things about Protestantism that must drive many a Missouri Methodist reader to the verge of profanity. Last week, in alluding to some foolish remark made by the Methodist General Assembly, concerning the Catholic Church, Father Phelan says "The Council should read the account of the Flood. The Protestants of those days paid very little attention to the voice of God and related largely on their private judgment. The rains came and after forty days they were never heard of any more. There is a lesson coming for Protestantism. Let Church Edward Jenett is the crux the Church army extinction.

The resignation of Archbishop Lamy of Santa Fe, New Mexico, has already been announced in these columns. The venerable prelate has been at his post as missionary and Bishop for thirty-five years, now he is succeeded by his Coadjutor, Most Rev. J. B. Salpointe, who has been over a quarter of a century laboring for the salvation of souls in that portion of the Lord's vineyard. The first mission of the new Archbishop was at Mora; six years afterwards he was sent to Arizona, to the Vicarate Apostolic of which he was raised on its creation in 1869, being thence called to act as Bishop Coadjutor to Archbishop Lamy, which office was raised to the dignity of Archbishopric during the recent Plenary Council. Archbishop Salpointe continues the Rev. Peter Rouillon, the Vicar General of his predecessor, to his office.

—The decay of Protestantism is no where more apparent than in Canada. the city where Calvin was once "monarch of all he surveyed," and where his Presbyterian creed theocracy with a malignant bigotry that makes human nature shudder at the idea of the enormous crimes perpetrated by this persecutor under the name of religion. The burning of Servatus serve only as a slight specimen of the savage cruelty of the founder of Presbyterianism, and yet—with all the power swayed by Calvin—Protestantism is doomed to die out even in the abiding place of one of its monsters. It is now 350 years since Geneva was the most Protestant city in Europe, and by the last census we see that out of its 100,000 inhabitants 50,000 are Catholics! Among this number are several of the descendants of both Luther and Calvin, who have given up the religious errors established by these wicked men, and returned again to the true fold of Christ.

—We hope to hear that California enterprise has caused the products of this fruitful State to be well represented in the permanent exhibition of United States products which will be opened at Honolulu on the first of next month. The exhibition is projected by some of the most prominent Indians, and will be conducted under the auspices of the Italian government and the United States Consul General. It will have forty-one branches in the different Italian cities, and its managers promise to do all in their power to encourage trade between these two great nations. The permanent exhibition is to be free to all, and only such goods are invited as are apt to find a sale or to attract any the trade of the Mediterranean ports. The charge to exhibitors is $25 for twelve months, and the exhibitors company will take full charge of the exhibit on the arrival in Rome. There should be some arrangement for American goods among 30,000,000 Italians, and our manufacturers will do well to avail themselves of the chance and thus benefit the working classes of California, by exporting home made goods to foreign parts.

A variety of correspondence has to be laid over until next week.

Our Twenty-ninth Volume.

With this issue the MONITOR enters on its twenty-ninth year of its existence, and our hosts of readers in all portions of the hemisphere will be glad to learn that as the years roll by the MONITOR is enlarging its sphere of usefulness more and more; its circulation is increasing and our friends everywhere are assisting in extending its circulation. The battle in which the Catholic press is called on to participate so dearer of God's truth is constantly waging throughout the world, and the Church militant requires the services of a courageous press second only in importance to the prayers of her faithful children. Hence the Catholic press should receive the generous support of every Catholic community, so that it can afford the necessary expense to make it a powerful weapon in defence of the faith, as well as a courageous advocate for the civil and religious rights of every Catholic citizen.

This is the warfare of truth against error in the world, and in every such conflict in which the Catholic press is engaged, victory is sure to perch upon the banner of the Cross, for the reason that when God is with us there is far less potent as to be able to prevail against us.

The defence of Catholic truth, the propagation of Catholic principles and the vindication of Catholic civil rights is the mission in which the MONITOR is engaged, and in the propagation of these divine principles and the defence of Catholic rights, we ask the moral and financial aid of all who are attached to us by the holy bonds of Catholic faith.

Our patrons and friends among the Rev. Clergy and Laity, have done a great deal in the past to extend the MONITOR, and its notice of their neighbors, and we ask from them a continuance of such good offices. Show the MONITOR to those who do not subscribe for it, point out to them the duty they owe to themselves and their children to have a Catholic paper in their homes, and then send us their names. In doing this every reader of the MONITOR will indirectly become a sharer in that blessing which is promised for such a work of mercy, as we are told in the sacred scriptures that "they who instruct many to justice shall shine as stars for all eternity."

Text Book Untruths about Cardinal Richelieu.

The industry manifested by the archenemy of man in defaming the dead heroes of the Catholic Church, and in calumniating the Church itself, is really marvellous. It is not only in sectarian publications, tracts and other anti-Catholic literature that we find assailants against the Catholic Church, but even the text books used by Catholic children in the public schools are fill with infamous falsehoods maligning the characters of well known Catholic celebrities. Here is a note on the subject which we have received last week:

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR

Dear Sir—Please answer in the MONITOR, who was Cardinal Richelieu? In the school books and libraries he is described as a cruel monster, throughout the entire Catholic world.

There are few prominent ecclesiastics Church whose character is less understood by Catholics than Cardinal Richelieu. The world at large bears its opinion of him upon the dramatic representation of the Cardinal by the Italian Ristori Lyceum. In the stage the Cardinal is represented as a cruel, crafty, grasping, unscrupulous character who is constantly conspiring against those around him so as to build a baleful reputation upon the ruins of others. This is the Cardinal Richelieu of the stage. But the Cardinal Richelieu of real life was a far different character, he being honored by French historians as the true statesman of French monarchy and the great parent of French civilization. He was beset by perils and intrigues during his long position as Minister of State, and in such times as he lived desperate evils required desperate remedies. He saved France at the zenithe of personal friendship, and he raised enemies for himself because he defended his country against foreign and domestic foreign enemies, and at his death he left a country in far more flourishing condition than it ever before attained. The enemies of France aimed to murder her Prime Minister and to destroy the country, but the keen foresight, the prudence and patriotism of Cardinal Richelieu saved France and foiled her enemies, hence he was hated by those who sought by open war and secret conspiracy to pull down that great Catholic power. This is the true character of this great statesman, but as it is the boundless duty of all book makers for American public schools to blacken the reputation of all Catholic historical characters, we are hardly astonished to find such a pen-portrait of Cardinal Richelieu in the so-called "histories" where all such Catholic matters are invariably set forth in a style so as to make them genuine complicates agry the truth.

We are sorry under the painful necessity of correcting false sensational item published by our own zealous contemporary the Chronicle. Readers of that paper were shocked on Monday morning last when that the grave of the dead buried in the Catholic cemetery at Santa Cruz were desecrated and their remains disturbed by those who were engaged in digging the foundation for the new Catholic church at that place. The Chronicle even went so far as to "enter into details" and we were informed that the dead was among the graves then desecrated. A group denial of the article fabricated falsehood was sent to the Chronicle but an attempt whatever was paid thereto, and then the "enterprise" of the Chronicle in not publishing a full flight falsehood and then sticking to it although it had received a written denial of the whole story. This may be "enterprise, but it is not such a Christian one nor generous, although unmentionable may consider it better to sell a lie rather to base flunkeys an argument against Christian burial, than to tell the truth and thereby lose a special sensational story calculated to startle the community beyond the expense of administering the pastor in a Catholic Church.

Shall it be Home Rule or Revolution in Ireland?

The press and people of Ireland are just now speculating upon the future prospects of the outcome of the present agitation. Mr. Chamberlain and other representative spokesmen of England declare that Home Rule will not and must not be granted to the Irish people, for the reason that it will be the beginning of the end of England.

Ireland is the Irish people the power to close their ports against all English commerce and to refuse to perform military duties. Mr. Chamberlain also declares that if Home Rule is granted there will be within a few hours sail from England "another Ireland, of equal growth and strength." We may then be driven from our ports, and "we may be compelled, the last resort, to blockade Ireland." Mr. Chamberlain's argument of Irish weakness is rather weak.

The paper then discusses the probable result of England following the policy indicated in Mr. Chamberlain's speeches, and says that such a course would probably result in a French army landing at Limerick, simultaneously with an Irish conflagration in all the principal cities in England, and well-planned attacks on the various palaces and banks in London. It concludes the charge of impolicy of the Irish people, illustrate at a possible national bequeathing of English statesmen, commercial travellers, officials, soldiers and governors, and warns Mr. Chamberlain to moderate his rancor toward Ireland.

The gravity of the situation in Ireland, therefore, is far more alarming than we have at a distance considered. The alternative of Home Rule or such a revolution as the Irish people determine to carry out is perfectly fair, and it is to be hoped that the parliament moves of political influence among English political parties will be guided more by common sense than be influenced by the inflammable utterances of Mr. Chamberlain. England's policy towards Ireland has ever been to rule and to rain her, and it is possible that John Bull may persevere in this course until the Irish people are driven by desperation from a sensitutional system of agitation for their rights into that wild spirit of revenge hinted at by United Ireland.

A rather comical incident occurred at the meeting of the Congregational Ministers' Club in Boston, on Monday last. A paper relative to the beneficial influence of Sunday schools, when Chaplain Hicks called attention to the fact that the Welsh people had been "held up as been ideal Christians." He thought the matter had not been clearly looked into by the essayist, and referred to Conical Bird's early life in regard to the Commission who participated in the Wyoming riots. Rev. Anton Williams, who is himself a Welshman, said that Queen Victoria had declared that the Welsh are the best people among her subjects. He spoke of the extreme Puritanical conduct of the Welsh people, and the religion of the Welsh people was characterized by the Queen as "Christian." Mr. Williams replied that Victoria doesn't rule over America, and suggested that if they had more parts in Wales there might be fewer of her people to make this country like those who remembered the Wyoming outrage. Brother Hicks was sorry out from the meeting to weep and wait at his brother preacher's entire that assuming the sociability of Washington.

The English Crusade against Canadian Catholics.

Last week we had to call a city contemporary to account for attacking the Catholics of Canada, but it seems that our local confrere took its cue from the pro-British press of Canada where there is at present raging a bitter war of words between the representative newspapers of these different nationalities.

[illegible] the pro-British press of Canada treat there recently appeared a vicious attack upon the Canadians for their sanitary inaction. The writer advised employers to discharge the French Canadians, as "we entirely due to their unclean lives and refusal to take precautions that the small pox had spread towards an extent."

To this L'Etendard—a Catholic paper—makes this caustic reply, the reading of which must have made the John Bull element in Canada mad enough "to blow up the whole blarney territory, yet know:

L'Etendard thus scores its English opponent

"As a contagion is feared from the bank bills handled by the inferior race, and Italy gold has to be disinfected by the fetid which never leaves them. It would be desirable to send a pair of chlorine Englishmen from the chance of taking the drop by some other Canadian or English Canadian office, or an English warehouse. Let us hope that the Canadians will be protected against the contagion of the English, and give a reason to your Canadians to make the to say that English Canadians are not the only people who are filthy Canadians.

Just imagine English eyes, English ears, and noses than all. English noses, to have unceasing to be offended by the French people. Is it really shocking. Ah we are very cojo. Not only do we deprive the Canadians of the risk of predating the ground that our man has ever trodden, but we have the pleasure of opening it at the point of their valiant sword. It is a pleasure which we have not enjoyed since the Canadians have not enjoyed since the time when the right of breathing before us belonged to the Canadians, and belonged to British. And in spite of all this English Canadians are not ungrateful, and they have second hand at. Just later poor blooded Saxon. The Irish people are in the same case, and have situated by French lines Stocking. Nothing, After, yes, we who never make where a dirtier drink than sour milk water so dirty as the people. Farm and Home.

To Get Rid of Cockroaches.

A correspondent writes as follows "I beg to forward you an easy, clean, and certain method of eradicating those loathsome insects from dwelling houses. A few years ago my house was infested with cockroaches (or 'shoals,' as they are called here), and I was recommended to try cucumber peel as a remedy. I accordingly, immediately before bedtime, strewed the floor of those parts of the house most infested with the rotinds with the green part out, and next day this, from the cucumber, and sat up half an hour later than usual to watch the effect.

Before the expiration of that time the floor where the peel lay was completely covered with cockroaches, so much so that the vegetable acrid not be seen, so voraciously were they engaged in sucking the poisonous moisture from it. I adopted the same plan the following night, but my visitors were not so numerous—I should think not more than a fourth of the previous night.

On the third night I did not discover one, but anxious to ascertain whether the house was quite clear of them I examined the peel after I had laid it down about half an hour, and perceived that it was covered with myriads of minute cockroaches, about the size of a flea. I therefore allowed the peel to remain till so rising, and from that moment I have not seen a cockroach in the house. It is a very old building, and I can assure you that the above remedy only requires to be persevered in for three or four nights to in the wake of the dress and its company. The deacon had just reached the line of the hymn,

Where my possessions lie,

when he broke off abruptly, and made an energetic plunge to recover his hat. He alighted upon all fours in the center of the aisle, but just as he thought the hat was in his grasp, the silken train gave an additional switch, and the hat followed with an additional roll. The deacon followed the hat, still upon all fours, but again it eluded him, and yet again and again. So intent was the deacon upon recovering his possessions that he did not see the least aware that the attention of the entire congregation was attracted to the sight of the dignified deacon following upon all fours a richly dressed lady up the aisle, over and anon endeavoring to grasp an antique hat, which as often eluded him.

A church meeting was called the next week, at which the charge was brought against the deacon of drawing the attention of the young people from the solemnities of worship upon the Lord's day. The deacon explained the matter as best he could, and the church by vote decided that he should be released without reprimand, but recommended that inasmuch as he peculiar he would now attract more attention than ever he should compensate the matter by procuring a new one.

The next Sunday the deacon's new hat and its probable cost was the talk of the town.

The Wrong Pony.

Major Brown, a Virginian "Forty-niner," once informed the writer of a story of a Kentucky's advice, 'Be sure you're right, and go ahead.' The major's disobedience to the Texan's proverb forshadowed his misfortune.

During the gold fever of 1849 a company of 80 Virginians, of whom the major was one, started for California.

After they had crossed the rock bone of the Sierra the major and five men were elected to go ahead and make some arrangements for the temporary accomodations of the company.

One day, as they were about to resume their journey, they found that his pony was too lame to travel. After consultation, he somewhat agreed to go on, and have him to await the arrival of the main body with the wagons.

"I had a lonesome time of it," said the major, relating the story, 'and I was delighted when on the second day of my confined solitude I saw three men approaching. But my delight was changed to anger as they drew near—for I discovered that one of the men was leading my pony.

"What are you doing, with that pony? I asked indignantly.

"He belongs to us," said the man.

"You are very cool to catch my pony, and have them kiln or prison," I answered.

They all protested that I was mistaken, "Gentlemen, said I, 'I am not mistaken. I have had that pony long enough to know every hair on his body.

One of the men poised out a sear on the forehead, and asked, "Has your pony such a sear as that?"

"My pony has that sear."

"Why," exploded another, "is this your lariat?

"No, but it is as easy matter to take one lariat off a pony's neck and put another on."

"Look here, said the leader, you are better search and see whether you have really lost your pony before you claim another man's.

"I saw they were not going to yield, so I said firmly, "You are three to one, but I you think I am going to submit tamely to this outrage, you are mistaken. I am overpower me, but you will not leave this place alone."

They saw I was determined, and one of them, speaking very mildly, said

"My friend, you are certainly mistaken. This pony is ours; we've had him for months. I could bother you by asking you if you can find your pony somewhere in the herd.

I pretended to take their advice, but kept within reach, resolved, if they undertook to carry off the pony to open fire on them with my revolver. Well, sir, I hadn't gone a dozen rods, when, standing behind a clump of bushes I saw my own abominable pony, lariat, rear, and all. I never felt so mean before in my life.

Explanations in Church.

Old Mr. Collamore is very deaf. The other Sunday, in the midst of the service, Mr. Hoff, who sits immediately behind Mr. Collamore, saw a spider crawling over the lesser's bald head. His first impulse was to nudge him and tell him about it, but he remembered that Mr. Collamore sits hard, so he lifted his hand and brushed the spider off. Hoff didn't aim quite high enough, and, in his nervousness, hit Collamore quite a severe blow. The old gentleman turned around in a rage to see who had dared to take such a liberty with him, and Hoff began to explain with gestures. But Collamore, in a loud voice, demanded what it meant. It was very painful to Hoff. The eyes of the congregation were upon him, and he grew red in the face. "There was a spider on your head." "A white plane on my head, hey? Suppose there is, what's that to you? You think I ought to be bald yourself some day." "It was a spider," shrieked Hoff, while the perspiration began to roll off his face. "Certainly, I'm wider," said Collamore, "and I can move in it than yours; but let it alone—do you mind?" Yes my lat my head alone in church. "Mr. Collamore! my sakes alive! there was a spider on your head and I brushed him off—that's all!" Hoff made one other gesture at Collamore's head. The old man thought he was going to fight him then and there, and, leaning a hymn-book at that, he seized the benches on the floor of the pew, and was about to bang Mr. Hoff, when the sermon intuited. An explanation was written on the fly leaf of the hymn-book, whereupon Mr Collamore apologized in a hoisterous tones, and he earned his seat. They think of asking Mr. Collamore to worship elsewhere.

The Deacon's New Hat.

Deacon Bodkin is an old-fashioned man and clings tenaciously to old-fashioned hard coarring. His daughters have frequently urged him to procure a modern silk hat and to lay aside the old style, ball crowned beaver, but to no avail.

"Gals," he would say, whenever the subject was brought up, "what ere is my wedding hat. Your mother picked it out herself, and I couldn't think of going back on her, you know. Besides, I can't worry stand that you know more than you what is fashionable.

A few Sundays ago the deacon went to church as usual. In the evening he attended a conference meeting, and sat in his usual place, depositing his treasured hat carefully on the floor in the aisle. A short praise service opened the exercises, and the deacon was lustily singing,

On Jordan's stormy banks I stand,
And cast a wistful eye, with his head thrown back on his shoulders, his eyes closed and his hands clasped over his expansive shirt bosom. At that moment a rustle of a silk skirt was heard and a fashionably attired lady swept up the aisle. The deacon opened the corner of his "wistful eye in order to take in the situation. The silk skirt was provided with a voluminous train, and, as its occupant swept past, the deacon, with the open eyes of his eye, behold his cherished hat rolling up the aisle in the wake of the dress and its occupant. The deacon had just reached the line of the hymn,

Where my possessions lie,

when he broke off abruptly, and made an energetic plunge to recover his hat. He alighted upon all fours in the center of the aisle, but just as he thought the hat was in his grasp, the silken train gave an additional switch, and the hat followed with an additional roll. Boys and Cigarettes.

The Philadelphia Times makes a vigorous assault on cigarettes, and tells the boys who indulge in them "The sharp cigarette is a modern invention, and a peculiarly vicious one. Twenty years ago when the cigarettes all came from Cuba, and were wrapped in rice paper, smoking then did no great harm. Mildew, being made of Havanaites, or some brand of equally strong tobacco, only a boy of stong stomach could smoke more than two or three of them at a time. But to meet the boyish demand cigarettes are sold now-days both cheap and weak. They are made of mild, often bad, tobacco, and for the most part they are wrapped in ordinary white paper. Rice-paper wrappings necessarily moistens the cost, and the boy who wishes to prove to Tom Tobbins of Amelia that he is not a boy but a man, much prefers the article that he can get the most of for his money. Moreover, the boy does not know the difference opposed to the right between rice-paper and ordinary paper, any more than he knows that, while rice-paper burns away leaving no ash, and only a slit common paper burns with a foul smoke that cuts like a saw into the chest and throat. He spends his pocket-money on cheap digestion, and makes every one around him uncomfortable, while he smokes himself away into an untimely grave.

The Poor Italian's Dog.

It happened about twenty years ago, that a poor lady living in one of the great cities was walking one day in a street, when she heard a piteous howling behind her. Turning round, she saw a poor ragged boy, with a cap in his hand, half furnished dog. The little animal jerked at her with his mild blue eyes, took hold of the border of her dress and pulled it with all his might, and seemed to say "Mistress, come with me." The lady took a narrow unfrequented street to reach the Cathedral, because by such a route she would not be likely to meet any of her acquaintances to give disagreeable, and it was also a means of rendering her walk shorter from the church to her own home. As her husband happened to be very busy at work, and had not accompanied her as usual, to Mass, she feared it would be imprudent to yield to what seemed to be the little animal's urging.

IRELAND AND AMERICA.

A Parallel Drawn Between the New Ireland and the Old.

A parallel, indeed! What impudence! To compare this little cabbage garden to the gigantic republic over there. Gently, if you please. It is the Ireland of to-day with a portion of America, and that portion of the thirteen original States of the Union—those States that were for 130 years King land's most productive colonies, but which are now at the head of civilization, and able to defy England—aye, the world. It is hardly necessary to go over the series of resolutions passed by the Irish Parliament gradually estranging the love of her own children—for were they not the descendants of the unfortunate Mayflower's passengers who nearly starved on Plymouth Rock, and later on became the founders of the city of Boston? Suffice it to say that the people of that easy city took matters into their own hands by having a tea party—the strongest one we have ever heard of, for it was the people who were boiling, and the water was cold—but no matter, the tea was brought up from the holds of English ships, and down, down it went to the bottom of the sea, where it has been bearing for the last hundred years or so. That was the way they paid tax on the commodity England had sent them to raise a trifle of money. The battle of Lexington came shortly after, and what followed those two events was the Declaration of Independence and the birth of the greatest nation that ever God's glorious sun shone down on. Well, her struggles from that time, until she was able to dictate terms to England was almost like our own—with this difference, here were for a few short years, core for many hundreds. Indeed, doubtless this time we might apply to her the words of Moore, and say—

"Come, child of misfortune, come hither,
I'll weep with thee tear for tear."

She certainly did not come hither, but we went thither, for it is recorded that Ireland at that period sent forth numbers of her people to do—what was never known before, viz., to help those who (reversing the sense in which Lord Lyndhurst used the terms afterwards) were "alien in blood, language and religion." The England we have struck a special blow, and that was reason enough for Ireland's assistance.

Like somebody, too, she was suffering from dissension in that supreme hour of her difficulty, and though the States, one after another, had given in their adhesion to the unanimous struggle that was about to commence, still it was so slow and heart-breaking work for those who were so eager to begin the fray. William Penn's State, Pennsylvania, was the last to throw in her lot with the common cause, and thereby earned for herself the name she is since known by—the Keystone State. On looking at the map we can see that those thirteen States ran along the shores of the Atlantic, with Pennsylvania almost in the centre, and when she joined it, the keystone was in its place, and that which formed in heaven's sight not "one arch of peace," but of war—war to the bitter end—was completed.

Through all the cries of America we find statues erected to the memory of the father, Washington, with the inscription: "First in peace, first in war, and first in the hearts of his countrymen." Well, who knows but generations yet unborn may read the same through our towns and cities, only the name will commence with "P" instead of "W."

Now comes the parallel. Ireland, after its centuries of tears and blood, its wrongs and its—"woes, has gradually yielded itself into one solid, invincible mass.

Lately, as we know, the Bishops have given their blessing to Mr. Parnell's programme, and in the Archiepiscopal city of Dublin has been filled by one who will utter no uncertain sound, we can see by the evidence that the arch which was completed in the State House, Chemnut street, Philadelphia, on the 4th of July, 1776, was erected in Ireland on the day when Leo XIII. appointed Dr. Walsh to the metropolitan chair—whilst Mr. Errington has constantly appeared in his place, sign with M. Parnell in his struggle against England, and are nearly helped with the assistance of one who which Mr. Handicks upholds the cause of Ireland. The Prince of Leinster, in commenting the speech, considered it impossible to exaggerate the importance of Mr. Handicks' utterances.

Marriage of Diana Nevada.

PARIS, October 1.—Mlle. Nevada was married to-day to Dr. Raymond Palmer of Milwaukee, England. The civil service took place at the Rue Scribe, and the religious ceremony took place at the Church of the Passionist Fathers. The bridesmaids were Mlle. Marie Marchesi, Forrest and Taft of Anacrion, Sabrit, the Baroness Stoeckl, and Mlle. Rose Caron. The whole dance was large, American, English, and Parisian aristocracy, and the Prince of Leinster. The bridegroom was followed by most enthusiastic and the display of flowers and elegant costumes left an air of gorgeous magnificence. Father Michael Wills himself of the Passionist Fathers, assisted by Father Joseph Rigbeth, London, delivered an eloquent sermon. A wedding breakfast followed the ceremony. Miss Lucie Moore sang a solo, with harp accompaniment.

No Crime in Ireland.

LONDON, October 1.—Sir Michael Hicks-Beach in a speech at Bristol yesterday, referring to the alarmist harangue of boycotting in Ireland, said the Government was prepared to deal with the evil with a strong hand. He believed the Irish people would explain the action of the Government regarding the matter. He believed Gladstone's speech delivering under his statements concerning government of the past year, was a mistake. Ireland, he said, was the only country in which no crime in Ireland were absurdly overdrawn.

MANUAL OF HYMNS AND DEVOTIONS.

BY REV. P. M. GREGORY, C. S. S. R., D. T.

Father Gregory, of the Redemptorists, has recently published in English in New York a manual of hymns and devotions intended to aid in carrying out the wish of the Bishops of the Province of New York especially, that the congregational singing should resume.

Father Gregory has translated hymns of St. Alphonsus Liguori, the Redemptorist Saint and Father of his own, has set them to such compositions as have been known and sung by the people of Ireland and Germany particularly for ages, and some of which are already known to many of our American congregations. A portion of the work is more modern, but of acknowledged standard and all of a character to become thoroughly popular, and we believe that this of Father Gregory's will be the opinion of all who are acquainted with the work of St. Alphonsus and his devout followers. If used from the heart, cannot fail to inspire love and devotion to our Lord and Our Lady as well as filial attachment to the Church. The work is published by Catholic Publication Society, Father Gregory's brother, and is a source of mutual edification.

The musical arrangement has received the highest commendation from organists and other competent judges. Mr. Dudley Buck, a musical lay of children, the simplicity of their arrangement renders the hymns of the order for adults to learn—a great consideration especially with large congregation.

The book is not one of special but of general devotions, comprising in both the hymns and other parts all the usual practices of the Church including Masses, Benedictions, Vespers, Litanies, Litany, prayers, prepares, arranged according to the Church Calendar, and the Vespers which make it, easy to find that, in a time suitable for occasions. Typographically, the work is well gotten up, neatness is aimed at, and far from objections often found even in our religious publications. It is a happy and successful combination of the spiritual and practical. An edition of the work in German is in preparation.

Father Gregory's other literary productions are well known by the Rev. Father Wyseby, C. S. S. R., Rector of St. Alphonsus Church, N. Y. Sets forth the object of the book which is dedicated to the memory of the Redemptorist Fathers, Order for Lady of Perpetual Help, under his patronage, and has received the hearty approval of the Archbishop. It can be obtained of the Redemptorists, 111 East 9th Street, New York Avenue, N. Y.

AIR FOR PARNELL.

Funds Raised at a Mass Meeting in Chicago.

CHICAGO, Oct. 3.—The great meeting held at Battery D Armory to-night, for the purpose of raising funds for Parnell's cause, which was attended, probably 5,000 persons being present, among whom were quite a goodly number of ladies. When the object of the meeting was stated by the Chairman, enthusiastic cheers were heard and prolonged applause and cheering. The prominent feature of the occasion was the speech of Alexander Sullivan, ex-President of the Irish National League of America. Sullivan's appearance was greeted with cheers. Before Sullivan had concluded his address the collection was swelled to $1,000. During the evening from fresh of people were turned away from the doors, every inch of standing room inside being occupied. Following that of Alexander Sullivan, three more speeches by Judge Moran, Tuley, Prendergast and ex-Congressman John Finnerty, each speaking, earnest upon the subject for which the meeting was called. The enthusiasm exhibited by the audience was remarkable, and when subscriptions were called for hardly an individual present failed to respond. The lowest estimate places the amount subscribed at $5000, and it may reach a little more than that. The following telegram was approved and ordered to be sent to Mr. Parnell in England:

"Ten thousand Chicago Americans in mass meeting send $10,000 through Dennis O'Connor to Dr. Reilly for election expenses, and will cheerfully give their share of a permanent fund to sustain the members after election, or to aid Irish liberty in any other way determined upon by the Irish people in Ireland."

EXCITING SCENE AT A RACE.

Wanting to Punish Existing Landlords.

A Saw Where Hundreds of Heads were Smashed and Nobody Killed.

KILRUSH OR SHANNON, County Clare, Ireland, Oct. 3.—Tremendous excitement prevailed yesterday afternoon at the races for the Kilrush and Kilkee Plate. Parties of the Kilrush people have been made against obnoxious landlords who devote themselves to horse racing. Yesterday the following notice was posted in the streets and on the fences for miles about: "Mr. O'Connor, are you going to allow those vile instruments of landlordism, Mr. Vandeleur and Mr. Vandeleur, who have carried their death sentences to so many of our fellow-countrymen, to come here to race, unchallenged, after being chased out of their house Hackaway and Stalls (dirty on people's race)? If so, you share in the infamy of the landlords' crimes, and be there to prevent, if possible, any such disgrace." Thousands of people who had been at the Limerick races had arrived to witness the sport, the same course was lined by tremendous crowds of angry men, women and children. Everybody felt that a big fight was to come off. The owners of the horses resented the attempt, and thereby earned for herself the name she is since known by—the Keystone State. On looking at the map we can see that those thirteen States ran along the shores of the Atlantic, with Pennsylvania almost in the centre, and when she joined it, the keystone was in its place, and that which formed in heaven's sight not "one arch of peace," but of war—war to the bitter end—was completed.

THE LAST OF THE ONULLIVANS.

A PARODY, PARAPHRASED FROM THE IRISH BY HUMBUG.

To conquer a year 1795, Montague (Duke of Buccleugh) the gigantic General and Commander in Chief of the Irish forces, made his entrance into Belfast, in the province of Ulster, accompanied by Sir Ralph Abercrombie, the Knight of the thirteenth Dragoons, who, had every star the house of Stuart could boast of, shining in the Knights Elder and Bantry Bay; and very cautiously they young Captain who inherited the sword and military prowess of the House of Bute and Bantry, was held in high esteem among a particular people, viz. Young Captain O'Sullivan, having embarked in connection in the American Army, was sent to Ireland to recruit for the Irish Brigade, which contained such loose as the hitherto field of Fontenoy, where

"The Briton turned to fly
From the valor of Erin."

Through his agency a regiment of soldiers stationed at Cork deserted the Red Flag and were conveyed to France on board the Saint Jacques, a vessel which had horsed along the southern Irish coast for the purpose of carrying her "Wild Geese." While thus engaged he came in contact with a person called Paddy, who grandfather had been a "pot walloper" in the Isle of Wight, and whose courage was so low as he might, "Sweep the Sky" with a mouse. Now to let this gallant officer pass unnoticed would be to be guilty of treachery, for the cold reptile, by which Captain O'Sullivan manifested such an ardent coward, he filled the only surviving taste of the brave officer, in the Irish harbor of Poulaen. Dennis O'Sullivan was a very old man, and his revenue office had little to fear from a contest with him. Soon after this conversation Capt. Mortimer returned from France and lost no time in executing the only law—the Duke of Buccleugh—he was called a coward. He shot the member of his aged uncle upon the spot, and then ordered his men to bury him in the hole he his own servant, Paddy Dwyer, had dug for the purpose. This is the historical fact which Captain O'Sullivan commemorate, and was translated it from the original written under a monument erected by Diarmed O'Shea, one of the "Monster Band."

The howling winds of honey March
Were bashing day and night,
And lightnings flashed from heaven arch,
Bitt temperate spring bound.
As night spread sound the sky,
Dark clouds rolled on and fast,
That student yet our Guardian had,
Be safe from the blast.

A bitter night in south, it was,
Yet, with the mighty crew,
A cotter swept the Blatten Head,
And late Shanty Bay.
On dark Walter Plantaten stood,
A wily, Norman chief—
A tiger listening for the blood
Of Glenn an Jarrow's Chief.

Around him are his kinsfolk Yoes,
A tied-footmen pack—
Beaver, to-night, hence Mortach Ogs,
Those hounds are your track.
Beaver, young chief, before whose blows
The Turk and Hessian reeled—
Whose sword has turned the tide of war
On such a fearful field.

Whose Celtic blood was freely poured
To expiate the Saxon's Crime
When Eurtoya's proudest despot hand
Would fain have torn it down,
Whose growing deeds of valor,
From Parte to the Ethiaw,
Quotidian bids shed upon
The pride of Hegesian Hoes.

Midnight's pall of blackest sheen
Hung over bay and wave,
Not a star could the baying dog,
At least of our Saviour's Satisfaction,
So, in the darkness and the gloom
Two nightly demons stirred
Their bowl and broom, their glen and room,
Or a double assassinate.

Not half they where the Cobbs
Their stately temples rear,
But, while the sails, secured, slacked,
Dark, rugged, cold and bare,
Our gallant Bantry Bay, the bowl,
Not chest, dared not
Lest some foe to mine their prey,
Like beasts in the chase.

Anon falls on their guilty ears
The booming of the bells
As dingy Dunmore night appears Cliffs Cathedral hills of
Ulster, Ulster, Ulster, and houses,
Ulster, Ulster, Ulster, and houses,
The savage possess about:
"Hi, ye Hebrew chief, curmudge!
The Norman ruffian roared,
As on the hillside rises there
His pulling bandogs poured.

Beneath the oven, some cowardly yes
Cowed, cowed, and trembled, and
And tame and tamed, black in air,
Blazes like an Indian
And hurrid cooks and blasphemy
Are mingled with the scene,
And mournfully the village rings
With mutcen's wailing keen.

Yet, fearlessly O'Sullivan—
By Scotty's plume betrayed—
(With not a weapon of defence, Save his good Austrian blade)
Out from the stagnog searching flames
Where now blazed the trusty blade
Plundered to the fray.

But soon the steels was sealed,
And that ship was taken
With freedom just and revelry
Of a commanded sash sighing
And in some adult O'sullivan,
Of a Bantry Bay,
We behove as proud as hunter's prey,
Across a bony house.

Dunbale is ransacked, thence they the tide,
To Cork's fair town they they
His mangled flesh, and spike his head
Upon the Shandon Cork Jail
Ith with and attention, that were ta'en,
But of them not a word.
Throughout those morning years on earth,
His closmen ever heard.

Arts, mock on, alone, as you will,
Your jeers and shakings, vain,
Yet, for the old Celtic blood
Will ever and ever bubble free
Of or bay and mountain blue,
Proud of the old Celtic blood
Lamb plumes lose sho'

Yes, when our heads from distant lands
Will be bewered (sorrow)
Ev'ry valley round, and inglens bound
Ev'ry mountain side
When could with four sorrow,
And pelan such fatsan rapie,
Up then a monument shall we
For the death of Morton's Ope.

THE WAY TO SING.

Here's one of the most excellent poems of the race
Just what we want, and it is the only, Mr. Editor
Subscriber, "B."

The birds must know. Who wisely sings
Will sing as they
The composer ne'er has preserve wings;
Songs make their way.

No manner to rain, no fashion
Devising plans;
No mention of the place, or hour,
To any man.
No waking till some sound betrays
A listening ear;
No difficulty—there are few delays
If I sings drear sane.

"What bird is that? The song is good,"
And anger eyes
Go peering through the dusky wood
In glad surprise.

Then late at night, when by the fire
The traveler sits,
Watching the flame grow brighter, higher,
The sweet song flits
By ember-light with weary brain,
To help him rest.
When sad he goes that road again,
An empty nest.

On leaden bough will make him sigh,
"Ah me! last Spring,
Just here I heard, in passing by,
That rare old bird."

Hot while he sips, remembering
How sweet the song,
The little bird, so strange, so
Is home along
In other air, and other men,
With wary feet,
Or other roofs, the simple strain
Are finding sweet.

The birds know not how the wisely sings
Will sing as they;
The common air has generous wings;
Songs make their way.

A Charming Story.

How the Bunn Family at Last Moved into the Country.

CHAPTER III.

She did "hold together." Through all those long hours of terror, the little house—rocking and staggering at times, and thumped and jammed by floating debris—held together, and it lay safely down and safely along "off there," as Mr. Bunn expressed it, and all the children slept quietly again peacefully, as if lulled into deeper slumber by the rocking of the waters common results. They appeared to be in the middle of the river, for there was plenty of sea room, as Mr. Bunn said, but the shore on either side was shut out by a heavy fog.

"If we could only see the banks, it wouldn't be quite so awful," moaned poor Polly, nervously shivering in spite of a three shawl in which she was wrapped.

"Daddy, be thankful we're spared so far, and perhaps the dear Lord'll save us even yet," and her mother. But it was indeed "awful," moving in this fashion in the dark, unknown danger sighing and murmuring all around.

At daylight advanced they seemed to have floated into still calmer waters; and presently there came a gentle shock as if the house had touched bottom.

"Are we sinking, Dennis, dear?" asked Mrs. Bunn of her husband.

"Not a bit of it, pet! We're on land, that's where we are; and here's a tree beside us as big as a church-steeple—a tree right side up, too—and we've come to a place called Bunn's Island, I'm sure." Mr. Bunn, who had been so cheerful and plucky through all weather, set down on the bed and buried his face in his red cotton handkerchief.

"Ah, it will do you good, Dennis, dear!" said his wife patting him on the shoulder, and laughing and crying herself.

The Bunn family had indeed come to an anchorage. It was not safe but several trees stood about them, and in between two of them stoun also supports the house had drifted and was firmly held. The fog lifted slowly, and by and by the faithful Noe saw the sky smiled down upon them, and billy shores came into view, with glimpses of cultivated fields and budding woodlands.

The Bunn family had moved into the country, at last!

As the cradle stopped rocking the children awoke, and clustered about the smallest window quite stupefied with wonder at the strange scene around them.

Just at this moment there came ringing over the waters a wild scream. Mr. Bunn pushed the children aside and leaned out of the window. Just emerging from the impetuous current of the half-drowned village, and any number of hands pulled her ashore, was a little girl in a red cloak, with her hair streaming behind her.

Mrs. Bunn leaned from the window until she nearly fell overboard, then seeing that she had reached wading depth, she turned and gave all her attention to the little, panting mite who sat on the floor in the middle of the small House, crying and sobbing. Mrs. Bunn took off her wet clothes and wrapped her in blankets, warm from the trundle bed, and soothed her with many a pitying word. For a while the child could only sob and gasp in her attempt to speak, but finally she made known the fact that her poor little lambs were down in the lower pasture, and she had been out to see if they were all safe, and her dog had told her not to go on the bridge, and she had been naughty and disobeyed him, and his bridge broke up all in a minute—and—and—and then the poor little lambs! Grandma, she was hardly dried and warmed and comfortable, before visitors were heard shoreward, and soon a brisk bustling began in that direction. Nelly also nearly went overboard, and reported some men making a raft. She failed to recognize her father among them, because he had changed his wet clothes for somebody's black trousers and an old army overcoat.

"Oh! I can hear pegs," exclaimed the blanketed girl, after the boat listened a minute. "Pegs, here I am!" and she called at the top of her lungs.

"Yes, I am coming," came an answering voice.

It was not long before the hastily built raft was pushed out and brought beneath the window. In the stern of the scow-prow was then recognized and received with a little shriek. The father of the rescued child looked up with eyes that were overflowing. "Give me Kitty and I'll take her right home to her mother, who is nearly crazy. Drop her right down," said he half to his strong arms. "I've sent my boat back for the double team, and we'll soon have you all up to our house."

"Oh! Papa, I'll never, never, never, never disobey you again!" exclaimed Kitty, as they bundled her through the window.

"No, I am sure you never will," said her father. Then Kitty was unceremoniously dropped into the approaching arms, and the raft pushed away.

"All be ready for the next boat!" called out Mr. Bunn, cheerfully.

"Ah! I am so thankful," said Mrs. Bunn, "to think that we're not only all safe, but we have saved somebody else."

Then there was a great dressing and brushing, and great washing and polishing of faces and hands; for plenty of water could be dipped up with a pitcher and the knotted sheets, and the family were all in readiness when the raft arrived under the window.

Not such a large family could not be shipped all at once. Mrs. Hunn let Nelly and baby Hunn, and two other small boys, go ashore first; then Annie and Tom, each fully wrapped in bed-blankets, were let down for the next load; and nearly Mrs. Hunn, with the remaining small boy and a bundle of clothing, took leave of the house.

CHAPTER IV.

They filled the farm-wagon quite full, and the intense, impatient at the long waiting, started off at a pace that made baby Hunn's cheeks shake like two jellies, and turned the children's faces into one broad smile. The sun now shone radiantly, there was a smell of young leaves and early violets in the air; from the hill side came the plaintive bleat of little lambs; and, yes, there it was, the loud, clear "trilling—trilling—tree" of the robin from his topmost twig.

"How queer it is," thought Mrs. Hunn, "I seemed to see and hear all this yesterday.

At the farmhouse a great breakfast was in waiting for them: and baby, who had been kissed and fondled, ate, and gave some very hot drinks by her mother, was lying contented up in her lap in a corner opening off the kitchen, and the door had been left open, that she might enjoy the view in the big table and the big family that were to gather around it.

Such a breakfast! Even Annie and Tom were able to relish the fresh-boiled eggs and the delicious cream, which, with the bread or baggies section broke to two, while going, a big bowl and cold beef and beans to the griddle-cakes and doughnuts.

As for Mrs. Bunn, the dear old associations of early days so crowded upon her she hardly knew what she ate.

"This is the way people can live in the country," she whispered to Nelly, and she ordered when she thought of going back to the Flats.

But Mrs. Bunn never went back to the Flats. That afternoon she was seized with a chill, and before night she was in a high fever, from which she lay ill in the best bedroom of the Thompson farmhouse for two weeks. Mr. Bunn, Nelly and Mrs. Thompson nursed her faithfully, and took good care of Dicky, while the other children fired at large in the fields, the big barn and the large kitchen-garret, and grew well and happy.

As soon as Mrs. Bunn became strong enough to "take the air," she was lifted into the easy single buggy, and Mr. Thompson himself drove, because he could not trust the horse to other hands than his own, he said. He drove slowly along the pleasant country way, now swept and lofty in its fresh May robes, and at the end of a mile or two stopped before a small house, neatly painted in two shades of gray, and shaded by two lingly elms. In the rear of the house some men were building a new large kitchen, Mr. Thompson explained. Down the front of the grassy slope ran a sparkling pebbled brook. The brook crossed the road at which they were driving, and was spanned by a very new bridge.

"I'll be right pretty place," said Mrs. Bunn, looking at the shady little porch and up to the noble elms, and thinking how heavenly it must be to live in such a place.

"Well, I'm glad you like the location," said Mr. Thompson, "for it's yours, you know," said Mr. Thompson.

"Miss I" said Mrs. Bunn, her eyes growing large with astonishment. Were the fever dreams still hanging in her mind?

"Certainly, Mrs. Bunn! Don't you remember you gave me leave to do it? We did it was to hand it up here from the river and give it a little paint and a little white wash, and so forth. Your men said you were fond of trees, and so we set the house by the elms. Your man's around there at work on the kitchen now—it'll be finished in a day or two—and there's three acres of good grass-land and three of maple and beech and we've picked out a site, ready now for a present to your Nally, and—well, it's a small enough return for what you did for us when our Kitty was carried off on the old bridge that used to stand here." Mr. Thompson, drew out his handkerchief and wiped his nose with great vigor.

"All—the land—the cow—cow!" Poor Mrs. Bunn could not believe her senses.

"Yes, all yours, to have and to hold. And I forgot to say, that there's a fine school just over the hill there, for your youngsters. But you mustn't talk much, Mrs. Bunn, and you mustn't get flustered—just stay quiet, and we'll drive round to-morrow, and maybe you'll feel strong enough to go into the house to-morrow and look around."

Happiness is such a tonic that Mrs. Bunn was indeed able to enter that fine new house over. And she discovered what Mr. Thompson meant by "furniture for all the rooms!—substantial furniture for all the rooms!

"Oh, it's all too much—too much—" cried Mrs. Bunn sinking with a little rocking chair.

"Oh, no, no, indeed!" chorused Mr. and Mrs. Thompson, who had been anxiously watching her surprise and happy face.

"We value our Kitty's life as a great deal more than this. Indeed we do!"

Why People Ought to Marry.

The Detroit Journal published from a newspaper, the Scioto, dated July 1817, the following, which is good advice for 1865:

"If you are for pleasure—marry

"If you prize your health—marry

"And even if money be your object—marry.

"A good wife is heaven's last best gift to man—his angel and minister of grace immortal—his Sol Polypsarum or gem of purest ray serene, the fairest offspring of celestial jewels. Her presence forms his paradise, her smiles his recompense, her counsel, his brightest day—her kiss, the guardian of his innocence—her arms, the pale of his safety, the balm of his care, the balsam of his life—her industry, his wealth—her economy, his sacred steward—her lips, his faithfullest counsellors—her bosom, the softest pillow of his head—and her prayers the silent accordants of heaven's blessings on his head.

"If you love the Creator, you ought to marry, to raise him up worshippers; if you love the Judge, you ought to marry, to make them happy—if you love mankind, you ought to marry, to perpetuate the glorious race—if you love your country, you ought to marry, to raise up soldiers to defend it—in fine, if you wish well to earth or heaven, you ought to marry, to give good citizens to one and glorious saints to the other.

Before the Battle of Shiloh.

It was at the house of the late W. H. Cherry, at Savannah, Tenn, that Gen. Grant made his headquarters just before the battle of Shiloh. "The Federal chieftain," says the Nashville American, "was sitting at the breakfast table of Mr. Cherry when the first cannon of the eventful contest was fired. The General was a little late in leaving his apartment that morning, and presented his apologies therefore to Mrs. Cherry, remarking that he had not retired early so much on the night before, and consequently had a headache. Though a battle was known to be imminent, neither the General nor his staff suspected it that day, and they sat down calmly to a breakfast which was destined never to be completed. Mrs. Cherry, a lady of great refinement and culture, waited upon the gentlemen of her home in a manner which by its uniformity seemed to have won upon the respect of the female chieftain. He occupied a seat immediately to her right, his aide-de-camp, Colonel Rawlins, on her left, shoulder dislocated and injured internally, and a Mr. Jones, a gentleman, my informant, James Coleman, colored, injured internally, and a Mr. Jones, a gentleman, my informant, jaw and shoulder hurt, Henry Hiner, Nashville, N. Y., slightly injured, Joe Howes, left ankle, Mr. Thomas Murray, head (bandaged). A long table also more or less injured. A negro ran in a moment from Brainard to remove the wounded to that room, and the table was cleared for supper. Commander then gave them an order for the morrow, and said, "Gentlemen, I will be up early in the morning, and that it was an unusual able accident.

An Unbeliever's Conversion.

Can any of the dead appear to us? Unquestionably they can, with the permission of God. It is a fact well known to all who are in the habit of visiting the sick, that this is to believe every tale that is told by the dying. Hardly a day passes but some narrative is declared true by a gentleman whose testimony is not worthy of credit. A lady, a Christian, who retained nothing of the Christian education she received under the saintly hands of her mother, gave great readiness to help all who were in distress. The spirit of the lady had the possession of him and completely uprooted his faith. The Bible was a fable, the Lord, he came into possession of an immense fortune, left his great relations, and, the dangers which too often destroy the pious, in the great port he was day grasped. My God, if Thou dost not, I pray Thee, give me to me; for I am an unbeliever, and I think I am in great danger."

The wife of one of his tenants had died some days before, and he followed his house he beheld a strange apparition. The dead woman, dressed in her coffin, stood, stood before him, her countenance indicating intense suffering. She looked at her former master with a mild and sorrowful sumerable—his Sol Polypsarum or gem of purest ray serene, the fairest offspring of celestial jewels. A Priest's Crime.

It would be a mistake to believe that the Kulturkampf law is abrogated or allowed to go to sleep. Cases in rapid succession are being brought up in the labor journals. It was supposed that sinkers were an original outcome to our state of civilization, but the deciphering of a papyrus in the museum of Turin shows how the old priests of the Nile to nothing new under the sun applies to strikes as well as to many other things. This papyrus, which is a sort of journal or day-book of the superintendent of the Thebes necropolis, furnishes the earliest record of a workman's fit of insubordination. Thebes, in the twenty-ninth year of King Rameses, who is supposed to be Ramses III. The workmen sent a deputation on the 20th of December, to Hetmehn, the keeper of books, and to several priests of the necropolis. The speaker of the deputation spoke as follows:

"Behold, we are face to face with famine. We have neither nourishment, nor oil, nor raiment. We have not a fish, nor even vegetables. We have already sent a petition to our superiors, and have cried out praying him to give us these things, and we now address the governor, in order that he may give us wherewithal to live."

These facts took place on the 27th of December, the 19th day of the month of Tybi. The general distribution of wheat was then made, but it was not sufficient for all; it did not take place is not known. Perhaps the individuals who should have distributed food was absent. Whatever may be the case, the workmen sent a second deputation, the gigantic strides of Catholicity with a period of the thirteenth century, we have to go back to the Middle Ages. Then, indeed, Christian principle, Christian system, was supreme, the spirit of the Gospel. In our time, religious journalism is not only a useful and welcome ministrant, but only a very little possible to the welfare of society, but a sort of spurious Christian principle, Christian system, Christian spirit, Catholic journalism had to combine to protect and defend the truth, whether it may be—among all, the Divine truth.—Brownson, Brownson's Review.

Editorial Notes.

—It is stated that the number of Christians massacred in Annam, in the month of July last, amounted to the appalling total of 24,000.

—Rev. F. Boling, S. J., has received an important scientific mission from the Holy Father. To fulfill this, he is about to visit all the principle libraries in Europe. He is one of the best known linguists in the world. After Cardinal Mezzofanti, he is generally conceded to be the greatest authority on ethnographic difficulties. At present he is in Milan.

—A rumor prevails in the East that Father Chapelle, the popular pastor of St. Matthew's Church, Washington, D. C., and one of the active promoters of the Catholic University, will soon be appointed Bishop of a Southern diocese—pointing most likely to Savannah. A part of the rumor assigns as the successor of Father Chapelle, in his pastorate, Rev. Father Mackin, formerly of Baltimore, but of late assistant of Father Chapelle.

—"Lie always, lie boldly, lie like the devil," says a French contemporary in commenting upon some statements which have gone the rounds of the church-hating French press as to the terms upon which the dispensation for the marriage of the Princess Marie of Orleans, was granted. Among other things equally accurate it has been stated that the Pope exacted in fee of £4,000 from the Orleans family. The Journal des Romains gives the facts of the case officially, and points out that the above statement is quite correct, except in the details as to the amount—the fee exacted from the Orleans family was not £4,000—but $1.87 in American coin.

—It will be gratifying news to Catholics in all parts of the world to learn that the cause of the canonization of the venerable John Baptist de la Salle, founder of the Brothers of the Christian Schools, is progressing very favorably in Rome. On September 1st the Sacred Congregation of Rites held—in the presence of Cardinal Pitra, "ponente" of the cause—a session for the first examination of the Doubts: 1st. Si de quibus miraculis constat in casu et ad effectum de quo agitur. " A Pontifical Decree having already proclaimed the heroic virtues of the venerable Father, it is now a matter of course that the Decree should be followed by the beatification of the Venerable Father. The Decree of Beatification requires the production of two miracles, which have been duly authenticated by the Congregation of Rites. About Fig Trees.

"Will fig trees that are planted out in the garden bear better than those that are in tubs, in boxes, and sunheard in the cellar? the gigantic, deep should they be planted? And if you please, trying for winter, should they be first with a potato, a straw, or with earth only?"

"Fig trees prefer not bear better than those in boxes, and with far less trouble. You are never certain of a crop from young plants that are grown in tubs or boxes that you would be from the same sized or aged plants that are planted out, but the outdoor plants can become large bushes, hence have more fig bearing wood than younger ones. All the care the out-door fig trees need is to hold them down and peg them flat to the ground, and bury them about a foot deep with earth in the fall, and unearth them again in spring. My neighbor, Mr. Barlow, on Long Island, gets enormous crops off his trees treated in this way.

When planting for trees, plant as you would any other bush or shrub; shake the earth from the roots and spread them out. There is nothing delicate about the rooting of a fig tree. It roots easily.

In harping for winter, use earth only. Straw or litter would be cozy winter quarters for field mice, and pushing the fig trees against amusement for the mischievous rodents.

Mechanism of the Bee.

An investigator into the mysteries of animal life assures that a bee's working tools comprise a variety equal to that of the average mechanic. He says that the feet of the common working bee exhibit the combination of a basket, a brush, and a pair of pincers. The brush, the hairs of which are arranged in symmetrical rows, is used to wipe down the microscope. With this brush of fairy delicacy the bee brushes its valve lobe to remove the pollen dust with which it becomes loaded while ranging up the nectar. Another article, hollowed like a spoon, receives and ball the pleasings which the insect carries to the hive. Finally, by opening them, one can open another, by means of a hinge, these two pieces become a pair of pincers, which render important service in the construction of the comb.

Precautions against Fire.

In case your clothes take fire throw yourself upon the floor and roll over and over as fast as possible. If the accident should occur to another in your presence, lose no time in getting him into a horizontal position. If there is a mat, shawl, coat or hat handy, throw them over the victim, taking care to tuck the covering around the neck, so that the flames and smoke will not be inhaled. Now press the covering over the body until you have smothered the flame, then run quickly for a pail of water. Dash this over the body, and extinguish the smouldering embers before they have had time to eat their way into the flesh. As soon as the fire has been put out, take the sufferer into a warm room and place him on a table or on the floor. With a pair of scissors cut the clothing up and down the body and limbs, so that it will fall off. Do not attempt to pull it off, or you will take a part of the skin with it. If any of the clothing clings to the flesh let it remain and get around it. If the blisters are very large and seem likely to break, puncture them with a needle and let the fluid escape, but do not remove the outer skin, or you will expose the raw surface. Tear up old linen or cotton, dipping the pieces into moss or oakum, dipping it in oil and, place them upon the scorched parts. If there is any difficulty in the way of a hot water bottle, use a stone, heated in the stove or stream. Cream or lime water mixed with oil may be used. Do not use cold water if burns water is to be had. After the dressings are applied, put your patient into bed and cover with clothing enough to keep him warm and comfortable, and wait the arrival of the doctor.

A Shrewd Housewife.

Nothing annoys a woman more than to have her husband bring people home to dinner without any previous notification. It spoils the meal all around, for the side, guest and hood of the family. The guest feel uncomfortable, and no matter how skillfully the wife tries to conceal her annoyance at having a poor dinner, the person who has the misfortune to receive an impromptu invitation washes he was well out of it. There is a State official in Carson who has a weakness for taking people up to his to dinner without giving his wife any previous warning. Naturally his better half—for we hold the hat alluded to to be the better half—begins to devise some plan to vanish him bodoo. A few days ago he came in with:

"Sal, I've brought a young man up to dinner."

"Oh, you have. Well, I'll go in the pantry and entertain him while you run down town and get the provisions. Of course when you have enough you want something extra."

She sat in the parlor two hours and entertained the guest, while the miserable husband rattled about in the hot sun and got the extra provisions. A great change has come over the spirit of that man's conduct since that occasion.

What Causes Neuralgic Headache?

The increased, and apparently increasing frequency of neuralgic headaches among women must have a cause. There is one of simple simplicity and quite obvious which, has been overlooked, and to which it is worth while to draw attention. The pain experienced is generally located in one or more of the branches of the second cervical nerve, very commonly those terminating in the scalp at the occiput. As a matter of fact, the nerves of the scalp are irritated by the hair being drawn tightly back and put on a strain, not as a whole, in which case the strain would spread over a large area of surface, but by small bundles of hair which are pulled back and held in place by hairpins. Relief is often or commonly experienced as a result of removing the hairpins but this has only a temporary and partial effect. The injury done is lasting. If not permanent in its consequences. The pressure form of dressing the hair should be discontinued, as it probably, in part at least, accounts for the extreme prevalence of a form of suffering which is both intractable and distressing.—London Lancet.

—The late Rev. John B. Gillies of Exeter, Pa., by his last will and testament has bequeathed his library to the Seminary of St. Charles Borromeo, at Overbrook, in that State. This was a welcome acquisition to the great institution, for Father Dillon had a large number of valuable books. It also affords a good example which should be generally followed.

—The Rev. Father Gleinardi, lately returned from China on a special mission to the Emperor, goes back to that country on Wednesday, accompanied by three other missionaries. Their particular destination is the provinces of Chen-si.

Family Fun.

"Managed."

Women with abilities, improvident husbands are always to be pitied. Most of them, like poor Maria, are obliged to "manage somehow. How they ever manage at all is a mystery which in honest moments thought and care by such unfortunate wives themselves. The "managing" process is mysterious, and full of sorrowful phases to those who know by experience how it is done.

Maria Kittrell's husband was most improvident. His vested and fretted with could be pardoned for saying that he was "more than a husband at all." The poor woman would say:

"Lemuel, there's not a stick of wood."

"Well, well, Marier, you must manage somehow till we get some."

"But there isn't a bit of flour in the house."

"Well, well, Marier, you'll have to—well, manage, Marier, manage."

"Well, there isn't a bit of sugar, coffee, butter, tea, or anything to eat! I'd just like to know what we're going to do!"

"Do, Marier, do! Why I reckon we kin—kin—well, Marier, you must manage somehow! Manage, woman, manage!"

"But how?"

Was there not cause for a sting in Maria's voice!

"How, Marier! How?" When covered, the worthless Lemuel always assumed a blustering air.

"Yes, how?" queried the angry Maria. "How can a woman manage on nothing?"

"There's different ways," said the pleased Lemuel.

"Tell me," said Maria.

"Why, Marier, by—by—well, by manager, to be sure, and I reckon I would congratulate himself on having found a way out of the difficulty.

Maria "managed" for eight years, Lemuel growing more and more improvident all the time.

One day he came home from a fishing trip to find the house deserted and the cupboard empty, the coal-bin dirtied, not a stick of wood on the place, and not a thing in the cellar.

On the bare table was a note from Maria with pin stuck through it.

I've 'managed' for eight years, Lemuel Kittrel," the note ran. "Now my 'pint' soil. When there's provision enough in the house to last six months, and you have a steady job at something, I'll come back, and we'll 'manage' together. I've taken the children and gone to father's. That's how I've managed for us. As for yourself, Lemuel, why you must—well, well, manage, Lemuel; manage somehow."

Lemuel managed to get his wife back as soon as possible, by managing to provide a support for her.

Information for a Stranger.

A party of English tourists were coming from the Yosemite last week, when one of them, who had been dubbed the interrogation point of the crowd, espied a pair of tongues sticking in the face of the bluff, tons down. Nudging the coach driver, she shouted to be old Bill McClenathan, he asked: "Ah, driver, I wonder what the dickse those boots are doing up thuah?"

Old Bill scarcely glanced up as he replied, "That's a man buried up there, and the boys were in such a hurry that they did not dig enough to get his feet in."

"Hah Jawve, that's rary strange, ye know. "I'll make a note of that. Hah! say, driver, how long ago did this man be buried on his face dyke knus."

"Yes," said old Bill musingly, "he was an Irishman."

Our Young Folks.

[illegible] Blundering cat, could you not keep your paws off my work? Why did you not let me alone? Think that I was to place you in a commemorative character? nothing! I expected to have the sheepfold for myself and friends to rush into, your blundering precipitancy you have spoiled all. Be off out of my sight or I'll set the wolves upon you! I'll no a kitten! Scat!

The dog went away quickly and sadly, lamenting his folly in giving up a good friendship for the chance of being on board the first emigrant vessel that was leaving for Australia. During the voyage he was ill, and he had large time to ponder over his foolishness, when he was never grumpy, a whole flock into danger; he felt so deeply ashamed of his conduct that he became good for nothing. He was picked up by one of the sailors belonging to the emigrant vessel who recognized him as a passenger, he took him home until he went to see again himself, and when leaving gave him a blind man, with whom he may have been often seen in the streets of New York, leading him about from house to house, and receiving in his mouth, in which was a little basket, any small coins which the charitable might bestow on the poor man. He died in America never returning to my side, though longing at times to see his little friend the cat, he dreaded her displeasure and indigestion. He could not brave her anger, he was ashamed of his folly, heartbroken, that he answered and consented to the cat's behest, and, poor dog! he was known as "Bob" they called him "dopy." He felt that he had been a traitor and that he deserved it, he never held up his head, he was "dopy" to the last. Bob was the son of the cities of the United States.—Mr. J. E. Rogers.

A Russian Fable.

(In the monument erected to Krilof, the "Russian Æsop," is a fox relief telling pitiful tale to a crow, a wolf, a feline, that of "Fortune and the Beggar."

The beggar, carrying a ragged old wallet, was creeping through a village to house, and, as he grumbled at his lot, he was surprised to see the fox leave one of the apartments, and wave up to their threats in the village. The fox was a fine specimen, should be always unsatisfied however full the wallet, for, and the beggar, he thought, as far as often to lose all they have, and, he was surprised, creaking for and laying their hands on new rents.

"Here, for instance," he says, "this fortune of the fox, who is always trading prosperously, and made himself rich enough, and, that, instead of stopping and handing over his business to their, and their property, he has gone to look for opinions, shop for the sea in the ocean. He expected to get mountains of gold, but the ships were wrecked and his treasures were all swallowed up by the waves. He thought to get a fine fur from the sea, and he has found his riches melt away like a dream. He thought to dream, became one of the favourers of the spirit-tail, he wanted to be a fine fox, he was a fool, and he wanted to double it. So he plunged into the sea of speculation, and was utterly ruined. In short, instances of this are not rare, and yet people rush, to, a man should use discretion."

At the moment fortune suddenly appeared to him and addressed, I mean to say:

"Listen! I have long wished to help you. Here is a lot of drachs I have found. Hold out your wallet and I will fill it with the money, and, in addition I for me to say, be a good that falls into the wallet, but if any of the drachs, or, the money, is, and, should become dust. Consider the result, if you should be bereftered. I shall keep strictly to my promise, I shall be always, don't overload it beyond its power."

"Thank you, good fortune," the beggar replied. "I am come for this situation, and I shall be very careful, I shall not keep your promise. Blundering wolf, could you not keep your paws off my work? Why did you not let me alone? Think that I was to place you in a commemorative character? nothing! I expected to have the sheepfold for myself and friends to rush into, your blundering precipitancy you have spoiled all. Be off out of my sight or I'll set the wolves upon you! I'll no a kitten! Scat!"

"To be full of good always," said Nancy, whose tears were dried now.

Yes, to store it with good principles, good thoughts, and kind feelings.

Think Before You Promise.

The delightful general chase was invented, it is said, by a Brahmin named Sinan, in order to assuage a very tyrannical prince, and, by giving him something to occupy his mind, to prevent him from exercising any of his whims; that is to say, his psychic, or, the mental faculties, and, the chase was asked the Brahmin what he should give him as a recompense for having taught him to play at chess. The Brahmin did not pertinently to give him another lesson. "My lord," said the Brahmin, "you will find that there are sixty-four squares on each chess board; all the reward I ask is that you will give a grain of wheat for the first square, two for the second, and, continue doubling the number up to the last." "Oh!" said the prince, "if your demand is so moderate, it will be easily satisfied; make the calculation, and bring it to me to-morrow morning." The Brahmin did so, and the prince was greatly astonished at finding that he had promised more than he could perform, and that all the granaries in the kingdom did not contain a sufficient quantity of wheat to pay the debt he had so inconsiderately contracted. The prince thought apparent incredible, we therefore recommend young readers to make the calculation, in order to convince themselves.

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR:

Dear Sir—Standing to-day on the hill-top of prosperity, viewing with sadness the plains of Ireland, and behind the valley of suffering and woe from which the Irish people have at last made their ascent, those who have taken part in the scenes of Irish political drama, for the past five years, and felt the lashes of operation, can scarcely realize that they have been living in a whole century of hitherto unknown events. Ireland has made more political progress for which they fought but been carried out with surprising rapidity even to them. They there fore imagine a longer time has elapsed since they left themselves and their country hopelessly under the lash of brutal rulers. Still it is only four short years since every free hearted Irishman was hunted in British chains. No able son of Ireland remained free from the dungeon to raise his voice on behalf of his benighted land. Misery and adverse criticisms from Irish Freeloaders may thank God added pain was denied to be so the National sewers of Ireland. Ireland's sons and daughters of Erin rose to assume their accredited from a national death, while lifting her covered and bleeding form, they were whipped at the Dawn slain, imprisoned and exposed to the abuse of rude policemen and hill officials. In the hope of

GRASPING OUT THE NATIONAL SPIRIT,

England left aside her pretensions to civilization and displayed her true savage instincts. But she was disappointed in her hopes of leaving Ireland more formidable enemies than England contained. The spirit of the women of Limerick was not all slave, and could not be terrorized. Despite Forster's banishment and Gladstone's "reverse of civilization," the women of Ireland listened and guarded the National cause through and amid troublesome scenes. Dark as were their surroundings, the national heroine began to smile and joy filled the land when it was learned the Land League had compelled Gladstone to retreat. The empress was crowned. Dublin City then presented a magnificent sight—the place for keeping to longer towards its hero. Now, the sweet Irish women in a righteous cause seemed all in vain. A frolic we hand on the Irish people, and the dried rufflan ready for the Slave's bloody mission. Since then, they still be less ready than to class of privation, to yield obedience to that voice and to obey commands over that they are so strongly on the side of prudence and moderation.

In reply to addresses on Sunday, presented after the consecration of the altar, from the parishes of Ballymore, Dunlavin, and Castle Dermot, his Grace said, in reference to a series of statements concerning himself and the Pope, as in a position to give those statements, every one of them, the fullest, most formal and distinct contradiction.

The Catholics of Toronto and people of Monaghan assisted by Dr. Dinnelly, Bishop of Clogher, in most warm reception on his return from Rome. His Lordship was entertained with a banquet and presented with an address to which he replied in cordial language. Dinnelly, Mr. Healy, M. P., present with several other prominent Catholics, and the member for Monaghan's speech on the occasion was unexpressed. Mr. Sexton and Mr. Healy in a similar strain expounded every day. Their stirring speeches with those of the Bishop, Sullivan and others for the expelling stream all over the land from North to South which has set towards for the National cause.

ENTHUSIASTIC MEETING IN WICKLOW.

A largely attended and enthusiastic National League meeting was held at Barrowtown, County Wicklow, on Sunday, 27th September, when Mr. Michael Davitt, who was warmly received, expressed the satisfaction that Mr. Parnell, in convening the County Conventions for the selection of candidates, had acknowledged the right of constituencies to select their own candidates. He contended that there would be a difficulty in the way of the Convention unless some change were made when there were five delegates. He proposed that the Convention should be composed of one delegate, the clergy would be the branch body entitled to nominate candidates, and would be the greatest danger to the real unity between priests and people if this were to become an established custom. It would be calculated to convey to non-Catholic Nationalists

IRISH NEWS BY MAIL.

Antrim.—Mr. Collins, who had been for a number of years town councillor of Ballycastle, died on the 18th inst. Mr. Collins was a Nationalist and a member of the Ancient Order of Hibernians, and was connected with the nation's political leagues, and was a thorough Nationalist.

Armagh.—Thanks to Father McInerny and Michael McGrogan the week of registration in mid-Armagh was a success. Into the impoverishing of Mid-Armagh by Piers White, Q. C., and George Mac, of Mid-Tyrone, the union of the Nationalist candidate was certain, but the work has been so well carried out the Tories are not quite so satisfied with the result of this reform. In the county they were favored to the utmost by Mr. Healy, who was sent specially for the purpose by Sir George Kaye, who received the votes of the Orange crowds when he contested the city of Armagh. Mr. Smith, M.P., and his partner, Mr. Donnelly, lacked Irish at the last election, and they felt the loss of Irish and representative National claims.

Clare.—It is stated that the probable candidates for the Bishop of Clare county of the general election are—Mr. M. J. Kenny, the representative of Tralee, and Mr. John McInerney, Castle—a prominent member of the Lincoln Board of Guardians.

A placard has been posted in the town of Ennis, signed by the names of the principal butter merchants, and announcing that they will not for the future purchase any butter packed in machine made casks or firkins, and recommending the butter to the farmers as far as the packing of the butter is concerned. At the meeting at which the resolution was passed the transfer by butter from a machine made firkin to a hand made one was proved to be impossible.

Cork.—In Donoghmore the League have set an example to their ranks in the shape of a road J.P., Mr. Charles Lynch, Mr. Lynch, who is a man of considerable means and influence in the district, has been the "great mark" of tyranny or injustice. He alone, among the country gentlemen, had the courage to take the boycotted Spencer police tax, in his own enclosure, and the people against those measures as unjust and unwarranted, and who, in his capacity of a magistrate, had to be the instrument of the law, has read an address to his tenantry, in which he expresses his regret at the part he had taken in the matter, and promises to do all in his power to have the obnoxious tax abolished. The address is a signature of the tenantry, and the meeting was adjourned to be further called upon the resolutions. The Lord of Bandon said the meeting was not composed of the class of people who are interested in the land question, and that the meeting was not called for the purpose of discussing

CANADIAN SHRINES OF OUR GALT.

Where the broad St. Lawrence glances 'neath bright Canadian skies,
Near a busy mart of commerce a chapel of Mary lies.
Peaceful, calm and hairy, amid all the noise and din,
A sweet retreat for sorrow, a refuge pure for sin.
"Tis a childhood's shrine, that chapel! O what memories it recalls,
Of the happy days of childhood, falling whilst he dream-ed his walks.
How each niche and pictured title bring back some by-gone day
When life was all so pleasant, so sunny and so gay!
Childhood's gladness present, swift speed your shining bows,
A rosy Hope your future all smiling round with flowers,
But the forms that once built there and added thereto in days
Lie with fond love closed and white hands clasped on among the silent dead.
And, looking back in the distance, through a misty vail of tears,
I sigh for the ties whose sunshine charmed those varished years.
O, to kneel, as in those halcyon days, from life's dread life secure,
Beneath the dear old sainted dome, beloved Basseucourt.
There is another shrine of Mary hid where we may enter in,
Where we may learn to suffer, know the awful price of sin;
Where the sad, sweet Mother of Pity, so she chose her lifeless Son,
Pains be able to fearful wonder, what more could He have done.
O lonely sepulchral chapel, how sweet 'tis here to pray,
When the crimson beams of Calvary smile all our griefs away!
When we bow with bowed with bearing and Mother at cross's shrine
Where the Saviour's agonies have known was whose sacrifice Divine.
It is like a heavenly oasis in the heart of my neighbor city,
While toiling pilgrims call it Notre Dame de Pitie.
There rises still another, cruelly fair and young,
While the glories of past centuries are round its base.
Here hope smiles calm and sweet, Faith moves in her pride,
Lo! Life is very bondage beneath our Mother's side.
Here lurk through the mist of agon—her young Judah's bills;
We hear a sweet voice, low and tender, like song of summer rills.
"Si amabis—Mary," and while listening, unconscious hear
Fiery Jamesdale ring back our voices clear.
In our country's glowing sunset how blest are we who stand
Jubilate on our banners, Credo our legend grand.
"Ave sweet Stella Maris of our fathers, through the dark way down and mouth,
Is still shining on the cloth of the everlasting rock.
Of all the shrines, dear Lady, with which our Notre Dame de Lourdes is the shrine I love the most.
There I ever seems, as I pass with wistful eyes and tread,
That Heaven, where our loved ones dwell, is but a step before me.

VISION OF THE WOUNDED.

BY MISS SUZANNE C. DONNELLY.

Two Hands have handed me for days,
Two Hands of snow-white shape and grace,
All sound-ful and sore, as in the press
Is beaded the purple grapes;
At work or music, at prayer or play
These angel Hands I have, see,
And a plaintive Voice keeps whispering:
"These Hands were placed for thee!"
For me, sweet Lord! for me!
"Yes, even so, sayrafed thing!"
These Hands were pierced for thee!"
Through bath and dangers pressing on,
As through a fiery flood,
Two slender feet bedew mine own
Mark every step with blood;
The swollen veins so rent with nails,
I'll bemoan at least to see.
While the moans and voice cries out afraid,
"These feet were pierced for thee!"
These Wounded Feet and Hands,
Outlaw'd till the Voice grew
And more and more divine—
The Voice of Jesus, and yet mine—
The voice of Heart of me,
And the tone of Jesus, make like a psalm,
"This Heart was pierced for thee!"
For me, great God! for me!
Yes, even so, my love, my Lord,
This Heart was pierced for me!

THE OLD PARSNEY ELEGY.

On a green, grassy knoll, by the banks of the Rhine,
That so long and so often has watered his footsteps,
The old parsnip rests in his long and last sleep,
While the waters a low, lisping lullaby sing.
He has plowed his last furrow, he has reaped his last grain;
No more shall awaks him to labor again.
The blue bird sings sweet on the gay maple tree,
The sparrow oft observed him skilled holding the plow;
The robin does not sing a lay light on the mold,
For he fed them with crumbs when his cup was full.
You tree that with fragrance is filling the air,
Be rich with its blossoms, so thrifty and fair,
By his sweat it was planted, and well did he
It would thrive when its planter had mouldered away.
Thus the well that he dug, with the water so cold,
While he rest, dripping trickle, so mossy and old.
No more from its depths by the peasbrch drawn
For the pitcher is broken, the old man is gone!
Thus a gloom-giving day when the old farmer
The sheet bearers mourned, the affectionate
And the prayers of the poor for his rest did so.
For they all lost a brother, a man and a friend,
For upright and honest the old farmer was,
He lived in peace, he died in peace, and his grave
Though footsteps be lifeless, his face gives where his
Will verbalize, like the gold, all the dross of this earth.
He has plowed his last furrow, he has reaped his last grain,
No more shall awaks him to labor again.

Winny.

The Wife I Won in the Worse

Stranger to Canada, I think you said? First visit to Ontario! Well, you're heartily welcome to Indian Creek. Take a chair on the piazza till dinner's ready—we dine early in these new world parts.

Fine farm! Well, yes; Indian Creek is a nice place, I'll do you it. All, as far as you can see—green land, cows feeding, woods and creeks—all belongs to it. Stock too—they call it the best-stocked farm in Ontario, I believe, and I dare say they're right. All mine; and yet I came to Canada twelve years ago, without even the traditional half crown in my trousers' pocket. You look surprised. Would you like to hear the story? There's a good half hour to dinner time yet and it's a story I at never tired of telling, somehow.

I began life as the son of a village carpenter in the South of England. You know what alms pretty well, I dare say, and what a grief was friend between me and the vicar of the parish. And yet—and yet—from the time she was 7 years old and I eleven, she fell down in the dusty road before the aforesaid vicar's door, and I picked her up, and smoothed the little crumpled pinafore, and kissed the dust out of her golden curls, I loved but one girl in the world and that was this vicar's daughter, Winny Hammonsbe.

Madness, you'll say. Well perhaps so. And yet a man is but a man, and a woman a woman; and loves comes whatever one may do. There's no disse distinction recognized by childhood, and we were playmates and friends till she went to the boarding-school. If Miss Winny, had had a mother, no doubt things would have been very different; but we were alike to meet knowing a woman's care, and the old vicar was blind to everything but his theological treatises.

But when she came back from her London finishing school, a wonderful young lady, all smiles and graces and lovely little ways—then I knew. I had tried my best to study and work, and make myself more like the man she would meet; but what can a lad in an English village do! I just had enough education to make sway other lad in the place hate me, and beside the men of her world I suppose I cut rather an astonishing figure. Yet the force of her was so beyond all else in me, that and, hopeless as I felt it, I had no power over myself; and that first time I caught her alone in the woods—she avoided me, I saw, and I had to watch for a chance—I had her the whole story, and waited for her answer. Sha grew scarlet—a rush of color that dyed her sweet fair face—then deadly white.

"Dick," she said, and she was trembling from head to foot, "you know it can never, never be; you know you are wrong even to dream of such a thing. Some girls would think it an insult—I know you better; and if my father heard of this he would say you had abused his kindness to you; he would never forgive you. Forget your madness, and she ran away from me.

I let her go. I had seen the blush and the tremor, and I guessed that if I had been Mr. Lyle, the young curate, instead of Dick Hawvry, the carpenter's son, her answer might have been different. I crept resolve spring up in my soul, and I took a solemn vow in those dims woods. That night I sold the old shop (my father was dead, and I had taken to the business), and with the money I bought an outfit, and started straight for Canada. It was pretty tough work for me, but I was young and grim-stared—starved and pinched and saved, and now I owed a penny on nearly acres for the books I sat up half the night to read and study. Well in this country the man who works and doesn't drink is sure to get on; and I had a mighty purpose in my head. Hymn-and-lya I bought some land dirt-cheap, and sold it for three times what I gave for it—then I began to make money fast. I should call my luck wonderful if I believed in luck, and didn't prefer to think I was helped by a power far abler than my own. At last, ten years to the very day after I set foot on Canadian soil, I bought Indian Creek Farm, and began to build this house. All the neighbors thought my good fortune had turned my brain, for I timed it up and furnished it for a lady down to a little rocking chair by my study chair, and a work basket with a tiny thimble in it. And when all that was finished I took the first ship for Liverpool.

Ten years builds a city one here, it doesn't make much change in a Devonshire village. The very gates were still half off their hinges, as I had left them, only the people were a little older and a little more stupid, and there was a new vicar. Old Mr. Brancombe had been dead six months; died very poor, they told me, since there nothing left for Miss Winny. My heart gave one great leap when I heard that. And Miss Winny! Oh, she had gone governing a family somewhere in the wilds of Canada and the ship sails to-morrow from Liverpool.

The Liverpool express never seemed to crawl so slowly before. I got there to find every berth taken on board the Canada, and the captain raging at the non-appearance of some of the crew. Without a word I passed I offered for one of the vacant places. I was as strong as a horse, and active enough, and I knew the ship's rigging as well as I could on the ship with my girl, little as she knew it. I saw her the first day or two looking so pale and thin that she was like the ghost of her self, and yet scarcely in my eyes than ever before. The children she had charge of were troublesome for little creatures, who worried and badgered her till I longed to cuff them. But there was a gentleness and a patience about her quite new to my idea of Miss Winny and I only loved her the more for it. After the second day out the wind freshened, and I saw no more of her.

We had an awful passage. It was late in October—an early winter, and the cold was intense. I blew one continuous gale, and some of our machinery was broken—the screw damaged—and we could not keep our course. As we drew near the other side of the Atlantic, we got more and more out of our bearings, and at last the fog told us we was somewhere off the banks of Newfoundland, but where, no one was quite sure. It seemed to me it had all happened before, or I had read it or dreamed it, and it was, it was hardly a surprise to me when, on the tenth night, just after midnight, the awful crash and shock took place in a fog such as I had never seen, and the full I can imagine in the boat—and we knew that the Atlantic had stretch.

It's a fearful thing if you come to think of it, a great steamer filled with living souls in the full flow of life and health, and in an instant lies all crumpling to each of them to die. Before you could have struck a match the whole ship was in a panic—cries, terror, confusion, agony—O, it was awful! I never never to see such a scene again. I made my way through it all as if I had eyes in my eyes nor ears, and got to the starboard long ago found out was the one which belonged to my girl. I knocked at the door with a heavy hand; even at that moment a thrill ran through me at the thought of standing face to face with her again.

"Winny!" I cried, "come out! make haste! there is not a moment to lose."

The door opened just as I spoke, and she stood just within, ready dressed even to little black hat. The cabin light fell full upon her, and I thought I never saw a fairer face. I put out my hand to her, and she laid her little white hand in mine, and I stood there in my sailor's jacket and cap. I wondered if she would know me. I forgot the danger we were in—forgot that death was waiting close at hand—forgot that the world held any one but just her and me.

"Dick!" she cried—"Oh, Dick, Dick!" and she fell forward in a dead faint on my shoulder.

All my senses came back then, and I threw her coat my arm and ran for the deck. I great fur-lined cloak had been dropped by the door of the ladies' cabin. There was no night and I stumbled over it in the dark—stumbled it up and carried it with me.

Up above all was in the wildest chaos; the boats over filled, and pushing off; the ship settling rapidly; people shouting, crying and swearing. One hears tales of calmness and courage often enough at such times, which makes one's heart glow as one reads them. I say here there was not a hardened sinner in the wreck of the Antarctic—every man behaved splendidly, and so did some of the passengers but the majority of them of the crew were mad with terror, and lost their heads altogether.

I saw there was not a chance for the overcrowded boats in that sea, and I sprang for the rigging. I was not a second too soon; a score of others followed my example, and with my precious burden I should not have had a chance two minutes later. As it was I scrambled to the top-mast, and got a firm hold there. My boy was just coming to her. I had wrapped her round like a baby in the fur cloak, and with my teeth I opened my knife to cut a rope which hung loose and fastened to both to the topmast. The ship sank gradually; she did not keel over, or I should not be telling you the story now. She settled down, just her decks above water but the great sea washed over it every second and swept it clean. The boats had gone.

One or two of the crew floating on loose spars were picked up afterward—no more. The rigging was pretty full, at least to the upper part; down below the sea was strong. The captain was near me. I felt glad to think he had been saved—he was not a coward like some of the others.

How long was the longest night you ever knew! Multiply that by a thousand, and you will have some idea of that night's length. The cold was awful. The spray froze on the sheets as it fell. The yards were slippery with ice. I stamped on Winny's feet to keep them from freezing. Did you notice that I limp a little? Sometimes there was a splash in the black water below and some poor fellow's stiffened hold relaxed, and he fell from his place from the rigging. There was not a breath of wind, nothing but the bitter fog. How long could we hold out? Where were we? How long never forgive you. Forget your madness, and she ran away from me.

I let her go. I had seen the blush and the tremor, and I guessed that if I had been Mr. Lyle, the young curate, instead of Dick Hawvry, the carpenter's son, her answer might have been different. I crept resolve spring up in my soul, and I took a solemn vow in those dims woods. MISSION OF THE CATHOLIC PRESS.

"Journalism is the chronicle of social events, because it is the chief agent for popularizing them, and popularized common opinions, and opinions growing popular, are the mainspring of social movements. Journalism is, in a word, responsible for the values of society. And a word of again limits. What is and what ought to be the subject of journalism? It is the chronicle of the moral events of which, whatever may be, never at all, the Divine truth—Christ—is the cause and the end.

May this blessed and chosen instrument, the Catholic Press, of Christ, render a home production this a fit for the mission of religion, the capital and income of our Holy Apostolic See, and advance the glorious and prosperity with devotion and fidelity.—Pius IX.

Editorial Notes.

— We learn from a European telegram that the Home Rule Garrison in Ireland, rallying itself the "Patriotic Union," has issued a manifesto denouncing Parnell and the Parliamentary party. This is the last flying kick of the tail end of the English dynasty in Ireland, and the Orange faction and the malcontent Irishmen who make up the mongrel tribe calling itself the Patriotic Union, will be buried beneath the ballots of the Irish people at the election next month. Now that the cities of England have openly shown their hand, we hope the people of Ireland will teach those traitors a lesson.

— The farmers of England seem to be in a bad fix. Last week the English Farmers' Alliance adopted a resolution stating that, to avert the ruin of the present race of farmers, landowners must forthwith reduce the rent of farms, and the Government must formulate a measure which will prevent the raising of rents on improvements of tenants. This is precisely what the tenant farmers of Ireland have been fighting for during many years, but England dubbed them "disaffected dynamiters" because they asked any redress for their grievances. Now, however, when John Bull's own "chickens" begin to "come home to roost," he will have to meet the question in some other shape than by buckshot and bayonet law. The way of the transgressor is hard, and internal strife seems to be culminating in Queen Victoria's realm.

— The virile authorities of Montreal seem to be imitating the French Government in their antagonism towards religion. Last week the local Board of Health agitated the question of closing the churches during the continuance of the small-pox epidemic, but Mgr. Fabre very properly demonstrated such an unchristian innovation as an attempt to suppress religion at the very time when the whole people most needed to pray together for God's mercy. Bishop Bond of the Anglican community also spoke against the proposed impiety, while Father Dowd of St. Patrick's, and Rev. Mr. Stone, of St. Martin's, Anglican, say they will absolutely refuse to comply with the measure should it be enforced. In view of such opposition we hardly think the Agnostic element in the Montreal Board of Health will have the audacity to attempt to legislate against religion.

— Mrs. Sadlier, widow of the late Denis Sadlier, has now charge of the book and publishing business of the well-known firm D. & J. Sadlier & Co. In announcing the publication of the forthcoming Catholic Directory and Almanac Mrs. Sadlier says that some firm in Wisconsin is about to get an opposition book and thus rob the widow of her legitimate profits upon a piece of property which her husband spent thousands of dollars in sustaining during past years when he lost money by publishing the Directory. We hope, therefore, for the widow's sake that the Rev. Clergy and laity will purchase Sadlier's edition in preference to any other. Still we must say to the widow that heaven helps those who help themselves, and the best way to lift off opposition, in her instance, is to make the Directory issued under her firm come better, more complete and cheaper than that proposed to be issued by the Wisconsin firm, and then achieve success by deserving it.

Powerful Influence of the Irish National League.

Some idea of the vast influence which the National League exercises in Ireland may be gleaned from the lamentations which fill the columns of the English press over the loss of England's prestige among the Irish people. Here is the latest whine of the London Standard over the failure of the Irish government in Ireland:

"It is a melancholy truth, but it is truth all the same, that over the South and the West of Ireland the law of the League has supplanted the law of the land. In these districts the people," means the "Local Branch," and to disobey the mandate of that impurious committee is to be "out of harmony" with the people.

. . . Ireland, according to the sense of the patriotic section, is completely organized in other words it is thoroughly governed by Mr. Parnell's course."

Better, far better, Mr. Parnell's "course," as the Satan Standard calls the League, than the brutal butchery of the Irish people under England. But the Pall Mall Gazette goes still further in its grief over Ireland having supplanted English mastership with Parnell's policy, and thus gives up the ghost:

"The day of Cromwell, Acts of the old style is over in Ireland. Law, in the face the future and, above all, the central fact of the already position of affairs, which is that Mr. Parnell is the master of the situation. Without Mr. Parnell there is no safety. We can no longer govern Ireland without Mr. Parnell. Unless we do, the Government of Ireland we must make terms with Mr. Parnell, and that means with the people who have his ear and his hand. . . . The people who have his support control Ireland should be the people who are trusted and obeyed by the Irish people, and that end can be achieved only in one way. It we are not prepared to govern Ireland by the law we must be prepared for Home Rule—and the sooner the better."

Yes, "the sooner the better," say all of us! Home Rule for Ireland and than peace and prosperity will smile once more on Erin's shore!

—Sadlier's Catholic Directory and Ordo for the year 1886 is now in preparation and will be issued early in December. This issue is based under the editorial control of John Gilmary Shea, who work has been greatly improved and we venture that the forthcoming edition will possess a merit of excellence that not only all the old customers of the Sadlier publications may purchase it, but that at least 10,000 new patrons may be found for it. A Waldenfaul, 127 Market street, will have the work for sale and will send it to any address by mail.

Annual Collection for the Holy Father.

Archbishop Riordan has sent a Circular to all the Rev. Clergy throughout this Archdiocese informing them that the annual collection for the Holy Father will be taken up in all the churches of this Diocese on the second Sunday of November, and requesting each Rector to have due announcement made thereof in all the churches.

We therefore desire to call the attention of every Catholic man, woman and child to this important collection, and to remind them of the duty they owe to the Vicar of Christ, who depends chiefly upon the faithful children of the Church throughout the world for any financial assistance which is necessary to carry out the numerous works of mercy and of charity which are necessary to the propagation of our holy faith, the maintenance of missionaries in foreign lands, and the assistance of those Religious throughout Italy who have been robbed of their lands, houses and heritage by the present dynasty which usurpedly sways its despotic influence over the destinies of the Italian people.

Every dollar subscribed to the Holy Father brings a blessing upon the donor, for the reason that it is used by the Saviour of Christ in charity, and those who give to the collection on that second Sunday in November, will thereby become the benefactors of the poor through the hands of the holy Pontiff, who is the chief representative of Christianity in the world.

No person can appreciate the extent of the Pope's charity. It was only last month that the Vicar of Christ sent forty thousand francs to Cardinal Celesia, Archbishop of Palermo, to be distributed to the families of the sufferers by cholera. The previous month his Holiness sent nearly as large donations to different portions of Italy where cholera was raging. Then he has manifold calls upon him from missionary Bishops in Australasia, Africa and Asia, to assist them in extending their missions in lands where there is no revenue whatever received from the native population. The renewed sacred edifices in Rome have to be kept in repair; ecclesiastical students for foreign missions have to be assisted, and a multifarious amount of miscellaneous charity has to be donated of which the outside world knows nothing.

The personal expenses of the Pope do not amount to two dollars a day, hence whatever funds are contributed as Peter's Pence in the annual collection, flow out of the Pontifical treasury into the lands of the needy, the helpless and the suffering. "He that gives to the poor lends to the Lord" says the inspired writer, and those Catholics who, with a ready heart, contribute their share towards the collection of the Holy Father, will find a returned to them from God's exhaustless treasury a hundred fold.

Evil Influence of Public School Education on Protestantism.

There was a Methodist Conference held in Boston last month, during which the Rev. Dr. Mark Trafton, a venerable and widely-popular clergyman, stated that Methodist Protestantism is rapidly decaying and why it is that the non-Catholic element in America is rapidly drifting into infidelity. This venerable Methodist preacher startled his brother sectarians by sternly denouncing the state religion of our day, and in order that our readers may have a full realization of how near the "ragged edge" of iniquity Methodism is, we append the full remarks of this reverend gentleman as they appeared in the New York Sun:

"I confess," he said, "I don't like to go to church. I'm sorry to say it. When I was a boy I was glad when they said, 'Let us go into the house of the Lord.' I enjoyed the preaching, the singing, and the praying.

"But times have gone from those days.

"Now, what is the new wonder? I'm bewildered with such amazing, startling, astounding facts that I can scarcely sleep and I don't dare to talk much for some my fears had our private circle. Sometimes to the church door—I'm praying what happens exactly—and we see plenty of male vacant seats. Where are the congregations? Why, I'm sorry to say, I don't know. Why, I'm sorry to say, I don't know. Why, I'm sorry to say, I don't know.

Farm and Home.

Small Farms.

Our own notice is that small farms, well cultivated are almost invariably the most profitable; and hence we firmly believe (what has so often been asserted), that if many a farmer would sell half or two-thirds of the acres he now occupies, and poorly tills and manages, and devote his entire time and energies to the rare and cultivation of the remaining, he would derive far more profit from his labor and investment, with much less vexation of spirit. The fact is, as somebody truly asserts, we have too many farmers who are "land poor"—who have so much land they cannot make a living. Paradoxical as this may appear, it applies truthfully to many a naturally fertile and productive locality. When such farmers have learned that it is not economy to own more land than they can till in the most profitable manner, so that it will pay for the money expended in keeping it free from tares, weeds, and other incumbrances, they will have solved the problem of ease in practical rural life. The happiest and thriftiest farmers we have ever known lived on farms of only ten to one hundred acres, every foot of which was made to count. On the other hand, the farmer who has so many broad acres that he cannot walk over them daily—where rods of these acreage are never cultivated or otherwise utilized—lives a life of anxiety and worry. Instead of working like slaves and living in a miserly manner, in order to "run a big farm," or purchase "all the land that joins them," it would be wise for hosts of farmers to sell some of their broad acres, concentrate their efforts upon limited areas, and look more to the comfort and happiness of their households, and the proper education of their children. Even if large farms were the most profitable—which we deny—small ones are to preferred for many and cogent reasons, not the least of which are the comfort, peace, and general welfare of the owners and their families.

The Rats' Sagacity.

Mr. Samuel Jennings writes to the Times from Wanstey House, Denmark Hill, to explain how rats remove eggs without breaking them, the feat having been accomplished under the observation of a friend, who described it. Mr. Jennings says: "My friend was in the habit of placing his newlaid eggs in the tea caddy along with the tea; but night after night they were unpleasantly removed, and, very naturally, the servants got the blame. One night, however, my friend was reading at a late hour, when he heard the scuffling of rats accounting the adjacent sideboard on which was the tea caddy containing eggs. The thought instantly flashed across his mind that he had been perhaps unjustly severe towards his servants, and silently he watched the proceedings. It was a simple matter to remove the lid, two or three rats descended into the tea-caddy, some remained on the top and in a minute the mystery was solved. One rat clasping the egg was being hauled along by his companions, gently lifted, and lowered to the floor, whence, on his back and still clasping the egg, they succeeded in safely carrying it away, and the whole were removed without breaking one."

The Dignity of Labor.

The birth of industry took place in the Garden of Eden. The first man was a working man. The first Adam was a tiller of the ground. Our Saviour was a carpenter; the dignity of labor depends upon the sense of responsibility of the man who toils. Labor was not a curse in the beginning. Although God curses the ground, still He honors the labor. Labor might being needed and trial upon him who toils, still it is sacred in the eyes of God. The nation that will not work cannot maintain its place in the march of civilization. The great trouble to-day is that there are multitudes that can work and won't work, and there are multitudes that do work and do not get enough pay. Employers of all a better charge than thousands of soup houses. Let them be concerned in their work, and the country will not need any poor houses. Labor is the mother of happiness and therefore of thinking. The busiest man is the happiest man. Enjoyment in our labor makes happiness. Labor lessens crime. The ranks of the criminals are invariably filled from the multitudes of the idleminded. Labor is better than genius. Labor found America a wilderness, and he made it a garden of beauty. Labor has joined the continents together, and her lands is the music of the world. Toil is an honor. The man that despises labor is a fool. The sets of mental labor become acts of worship if performed for the glory of God. Go out into life and labor until God shall say: "Tis enough, come up higher."

Useful Domestic Receipts.

Cabbage when cooked by boiling, should be boiled in two waters. This destroys the "essential oil," which is unwholesome.

Brown Bread.—Boil rice until tender, press into small tea cups, and when perfectly cold turn into a dish, make a boiled custard and pour over a half hour before serving.

To Clean Brass.—Immerse it or wash it several times in sour milk or whey; this will brighten it without scouring; it may then be scoured with a woolen cloth dipped in ashes.

Good food, properly cooked, gives us good blood, sound bones, healthy brains, nerves and firm flesh, to say nothing of good tempers and kind hearts. These are well worth a little trouble to secure.

Sausage.—Twelve pounds of meat, two and one-half tablespoonfuls of salt, one and one-half tablespoonfuls of black pepper, three tablespoonfuls of sage, one tablespoonful of white pepper, one quarter teaspoonful of cayenne pepper.

To Clean Spoons.—When very foul wash them in diluted muriatic acid, rinsing them afterwards in water; it will make them very soft and white. Be careful to dilute the acid well, as it is very corrosive, and therefore should be weak.

If those interested in blacking stores will try greasing them with fresh grease before blacking, they will find that it prevents them from rusting. Add a pinch of brown sugar, to the blacking just before applying. This causes it to stick, and it polishes much easier, and with half the usual rubbing.

Stuffed Onions.—Parboil some goodsized onions. Take out the middles and fill with force-meat. Put them side by side in a casserole, with butter. Sprinkle a little salt and a little sugar on them. Cover the onions with the slices of bacon. Cook thoroughly and serve with their own sauce.

Cream Pie.—Place a pint of milk where it will heat. Then beat together one cup of white sugar, one half cup of flour, with two eggs, and stir it into the milk when it is nearly boiling. Stir rapidly until it is cooked thoroughly; add essence of lemon, and pour upon the milk which should be baked before the cream is put in. This will make two pies. If you wish it extra make a frosting of the whites of two eggs, and three tablespoonfuls of sugar. Spread them evenly over the pies, and set again in the oven, and brown slightly.

Family Fun.

Sure of One Thing.

There was a case of assault and battery before one of the justices the other day, and a witness with a black eye, several stripes of court plaster across his nose and one ear badly lopped over, was asked by the defendant's lawyer if he saw Brown strike White?

"Can I say as I did," he replied

"Did you see the white either?"

"Mostly."

"Now, how was it?"

"Well, Smith and me not on the proper talkin' evolution. Jones and Green not on the grass talkin' proper—who have so much land they cannot make a living. On the other hand, the farmer who has so many broad acres that he cannot walk over them daily—where rods of these acreage are never cultivated or otherwise utilized—lives a life of anxiety and worry. Instead of working like slaves and living in a miserly manner, in order to "run a big farm," or purchase "all the land that joins them," it would be wise for hosts of farmers to sell some of their broad acres, concentrate their efforts upon limited areas, and look more to the comfort and happiness of their households, and the proper education of their children. Even if large farms were the most profitable—which we deny—small ones are to preferred for many and cogent reasons, not the least of which are the comfort, peace, and general welfare of the owners and their families.

His Parents should be Happy.

Some people have a great deal of trouble," was the proposition laid down by Mrs. Podsnap at the breakfast table the other morning.

"Yes," asserted her husband.

"Here's a boy just born born in Massachusetts with neither arms or legs," continued Mrs. P.

"What's that got to do with your previous remark?" queried Mr. Podsnap.

"Why, it must be a great trial to the parents."

"Oh the contrary, my dear, they should be the happiest people on earth.

"How in the world do you make that out?" asked Mrs P. in astonishment.

"Why, don't you see, the boy can never be a base ballist nor a champion roller skater."

The Sapient Schoolboy.

Stern father: "Look here, young man, your teacher tells me you answered yourself from school by telling her that your mother was sick. What do you mean by lying to your teacher, sir?"

"I didn't lie."

"Yes, you did. Your mother isn't sick, and you know it."

"She said she was."

"When?"

"Last night. She said she was sick of having you come home at 2 o'clock in the morning with your cuffs on your sleeves."

"Well, of course, if she was sick it was perfectly right for you to stay out of school, my son. There, here's a nickel. Run off and get some candy, and we won't say any more about it."

He Emptied the Bottle.

"Speaking of whisky drinking," said Mr. Thompson in his quiet way, as he was seated with a party of friends on his front stoop, "some man can drink more than others and not seem to feel it. I myself have emptied a quart bottle in a single evening without becoming in the least intoxicated.

This statement was received with an incredulous smile, but as Mr. Thompson was a truthful man, no one openly disputed it.

Finally Mr. Baker remarked that he couldn't doubt Mr. Thompson's word, but he should not have believed such a thing

"It's a fact, though, isn't it Annie?" said Mr. Thompson, turning to his wife.

"Yes" said Mrs. Thompson, "he did it

"It must have been rather thin whisky," said one of the company.

"No," retired Mr. Thompson—"was

OUR IRISH LETTER.

Good News from Ireland.—A Magnificent National Demonstration.—Speeches by Healy and Dillon.—Meeting of the Young Ireland Society.—The Boycotting of Mrs. O'Connell, Rio, etc.

[FROM OUR REGULAR IRISH CORRESPONDENT.]

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR:

Dear Sir—From every quarter of Ireland I received last week the most cheering accounts of the progress of the National cause. The further proof that the National back is fairly bound upon a net of trouble, is now unfolding the course of its hopes and preparing to cast another after its enemy voyage of curse on critics. From North to South and across the Isle from East to West the Nationalists are working as one man for Ireland's honor under the leadership of Mr. Parnell and the frequent wholesome counsels of Cardinal Walsh, while the Whig and Tory parties of Ulster are being torn asunder by dissensions. If the loyal Unionists do not succeed in effecting a reconciliation between the disputing factions, they will be compelled to compensate for the hard-working Parnellites in the North and tend to the speedy completion of a National victory all over the Northern Province.

A magnificent National demonstration was held on Sunday, the 4th of October, at the historic Stagyl Trough, in County Monaghan, for raising the remains Armagh and Tyrone. The meeting was addressed by Messrs. Healy and Dillon. Second only to the grand and lasting Nationalists belonging to the surrounding counties also spoke. In every way the demonstration was a hopeful omen of what the future has in store for Ulster and the National cause. In describing all the people came from Armagh, Tyrone, Monaghan to Shenandoah to protest against and stood in the foremost downpour listening to those men who have suffered for their sake and those in Ireland's darkest hours, telling them of their future prospects. Those two gallant Irish which were defined deserving of the reception accorded them by the twenty thousand Nationists who assembled around the platform at Stagyl. Mr. Healy was in splendid form, observed every entrance that fell from their lips. And worthy was Mr. Healy and her brilliant colleague, Mr. Dillon, of the honors of their Irish champion. By day's demonstration the blunders of West British orthodox have proved at last to Ulster's Protestants the wisdom of Mr. Parnell's policy give Ireland a fair little hope of a "split" in the National regiment, and the condemnation of extremist conduct in one of the resolutions leaves no doubt for those to work on who represent the National movement as an enduring element for fostering crime. Weighty words fell from Mr. Dillon's lips and they will remain with thousands of the many truthful incidents of the old Land League days, while Mr. Healy had cut a confidently and clearly that must bring joy to every Irish heart. The following suitably worded address was presented to Messrs. Healy and Dillon: "The auspicious occasion of your visit to Stagyl is participated in the good wishes to expatriate to-day at Bloomfield, is availed of to tender to the Parnellite Colleagues welcome. We esteem it a high honor, indeed, to have in our midst two such faithful and unswerving friends as Mr. T. M. ST. ANNE AND THE ORPHANS OF CHRIST.

Sweet mother of our Mother blest,
And noblest grandmother of her Child!
To-day our aprons, in jest,
Upon thy image pure and mild,

Than gentlemen at Joachim.
The saved assume to their footgiftsand,
We, mock to half-time, those who lend,
Besides thy Daughter's throne is heaven.

For on thy breast, ruby-white,
She nestled in thy arms by night,
And crept about thy feet by day.

Her eyes were trusting raised,
To such thy truth-all mother-face
And, when her cloud she gentlefie praised,
Thou at thy knee she found her place.

Iron abuses that rare blossom opening,
Whose fruit was Jesus, God and man,
What pain can trace, what happy longing
Can ring thy glory, sweet St. Anne!

What artist-brush dare paint thy bloom,
Thy chaste maternal fullness,
Or how within thy flossed wings
The Child whom man and angels bless.

Twas time to fall the sense of shame
About her tiny, fragile form;
Thy veil-cheek, and virgin brow,
To rain thy blown soft and warm.

Twas time to clasp those dimpled hands,
From whose pure palms (God's handiwork)
All marks and signs, illness and bonds,
Those hands of mercy, sweet and wary.

Hence, with such grief, in temple old,
Thou lifted strange them difficulties;
No matter brave, nonlonor bold,
Could unknitted and blunted.

For (all the after-days grown dim,
Meeting thy darling cheek and lain)
Thy mother's heart, thy mother's
O mother of our Mother blest!
We gladly gather round thy feet
As favorite children, fondly pressed,
With Mary, to thy bosom rest.

The while we watch that face which shade
Around us heaven's light serene;
And feel that hand upon our head
Which tended once its precious queen,—

Our sons, our sons we learn to be Cast on thy heart such weight of care;
Thine are the sons of Mary
To bear is but to exact thy prayer.

Ah! be in life the orphan's friend,
Dear patroness of the fate of man:
And guide us softly at the end
To God and Mary, good St. Anne!

ELEANOR C. DONNELLY.

A SISTER OF MERCY.

Her face is her modest beauty,
Clad in simple robe of gray,
From the sacred path of duty,
Smiling all the clouds away.

Which the children run to meet her
With their little pains and woes,
Sick and poor with blessings great her,
Love is home where she goes.

Tenderest grief her glance expresses,
Where the sweet and suffering weep;
And beneath her kind caresses
We and pain are lulled to sleep.

All who drink the cup of sorrow
Love to feel her hovering near,
For the saddest hearts must borrow
Comfort from her words of cheer.

Dear seem the skies above her;
Round her benighn such heavenly grace,
Yet we cannot choose but love her,
She is bright, supremely fair.

Hers a soul full of sweet divine;
And her eyes angelic, yet
Must the constant sadness show.

When above the faint and dying,
Full of pity bending low,
They upon her sore relieving
Feel a balm for every woe.

Hence, dear Sister, thy mission
Fraught with joy, yet strong and brave;
Tapping down the stiffening fingers,
Kindling hopes beyond the grave.

All the hollow hours are spoken
To the ear of guilt and shame,
So that spirits quiet and broken
Meet in reverence hold her name.

Blessed be the gentle wanderer,
And with loving words are let
Whatever upon her "rule of tears;"
With heaven's choicest blessings fallen,
To the unremitting years.

A Pretty Story of a Willful Girl, and How She was Won.

CHAPTER I.

"It is really too shabby; I ought not to have allowed her to go."

"Dear, you look so pretty and so dainty in it, what can you say! I'm sorry, but it is."

"Oh, well, if you like it I'll keep it on; perhaps it's useless; I have worn it so many times, the lace is mended in so many places; it's really good enough for friends. Green, that I am tired of it and must get a new one somewhere."

"Rose, I can't bear to hear you talk like that, and you in your prime! The pale, sweet face of the older sister had grown pale still. There was a pained look in the soft eyes, and her breath came quick. "If you want a new gown there is some money laid away in the box there—but we can get along—and you may use it."

Stung to pride, Grace confessed that the ensuing tears would not let her go further. Her sister spoke on:

"Grace"—and the pretty girl took that pale, quivering face in her two slim hands—"you thought I was in earnest! You thought I could take that money! You could think so badly as that of me! No I will never jeka again. I will always be in real earnest. I have noticed before now that I get into a great deal of trouble because of my foolish habit of joking. And now—now kiss me.

Wee not that sad-faced, gentle young woman, with the tears not quite vanished from her own eyes, proved to touch with soft caress the round cheek turned so pretty toward her!

"You know how pretty way of joking makes one of my greatest pleasures," she answered, "and I am a foolish woman, but if you want the dress—"

"Willed do my niehi etnon kiss gehen! said a clear voice from the open window. Both of the girls turned. A pleasant face—blonde, with a blonde beard, and pleasant blue eyes smiling from under thick waves of curling, fair hair—was peering at them.

"Oh, Raymond, is it you?" two voices spoke together. This smiling apparition, Raymond Brent, held out a dewy hand of flowers—all green leaves, white fleshy and ruby tendrils. Their exquisite fragrance filled the room.

"It is my contribution," he said, flushing behind the curtain that he pushed back with one hand. "I got them as I came along, at Floyda'."

"Ah, ah! how beautiful! How can we thank you, Ray I Oh! why was I not born a flower—just a white rose like this! Then I should not have to trouble about a new dress. Now, Miss Grace Wilmot!"

This nice eyes of the young man had been from the first fixed on this slim, fair, flower-bed of a girl, who was hovering over his gift in an ecstacy of delight. The eyes fixed now with pleasure, as she took a spray of buds from the bunch and turned to her sister.

"You may put these right there, if you please—there in that bunch of curia over my bureau, so that I can see it in my letter."

"She had been fretting about her dress," exclaimed Miss Wilmot to the young man in the window.

"Her dress! Why, what is the matter with it?" he asked, opening his eyes wide.

"It is old, and it is old fashioned, and it is ugly," ejaculated Rose, with emphasis.

"Why, I was just thinking how pretty it is, and I wondered if you had made it now for the occasion," remarked that stupid Raymond, with the case proud smile that, just like an apple and a half, I thought you must be a flower bud yourself unfolded.

Miss Wilmot smiled, but Rose made a dainty face.

"The lace is mended all over, but then it's real lace—real Mechlin lace," she observed, heightening her complexion almost with grave technicalities.

Happily he only saw the face, the brown hair ruffling on the forehead, the lovely eyes that laughed at him, the low, sweet voice that patronized him.

"Oh, Rosine, wonse Illinse!" he repeated rapturously.

"Please don't talk in that awkward tongue, cried out Rose, petulantly. "It only makes me think of my school lessons, and I can't understand it, either. How can I tell whether you are laughing at me or paying me a compliment."

"The young man laughed. "Oh, Illinse! I was paying you a compliment—a just tribute."

"And the other—when you first came?" Raymond blushed and faltered.

"That—oh, that was just nonsense; I must ask you to pardon it," he stammered.

"Nonsense! Why, I thought you must fear he would say to them aught that would be displeasing. She glanced at his face and, shrugged his shoulders, smiling.

"I was you going to the park Hay—were you on your way?"

Raymond shrugged his shoulders, smiling.

"I shall go presently. But I shall wait till the sun has lost its power in the afternoon. I don't ask to be dealeaned and disgusted at the same time.

Both of the girls laughed at his unmistakable look of distaste. Rose nodded at him from over her shoulder, her little white hat, with its blue bird and snow drops, making a shadow for her eyes to shine out of underneath.

"Oh, operulous musician! I wonder that a young man who has such an ear for discord mean can't make better music of his own, especially when he is the owner of, besides a cat, a genuine Paganini violin."

CHAPTER II.

The two young people went away in opposite directions, and Grace left alone, sat for a long time in the little room in the hay-scring sunshine, silent, but quite sad. Rose had spoken strangely that her eyes, and held its place on her mouth. For it was Rose she was thinking of, the pretty, young, brown-haired maiden, between whom and utter loneliness and helplessness in a bad world only her words of cheer.

Raymond. For Raymond loved the charming Rose; Grace was sure of that. But Rose! Ah! she was the "wonse Illinse," truly—she was thinner about whom the sun might circle, singing its plaintive song till it should die.

"I wish, oh I wish"—and Grace clapped her hands together with nervous force—"I wish Rose could love him. I could be happy then."

The large tears rose and fall.

"Surely a girl's heart is not so hard to win—if one only knows the way."

And the trouble was that Ray did not "know the way." He was good, gentle and kind; he would flush and stammer when the merry little maid asked him but to do something for her; then he would rush and stumble over his own feet a dozen times in the effort to obey her, and Rose would laugh at him.

earnest and claim the kiss and take it as his right, he might win my little Rose."

But just here the trouble was. Raymond was afraid. His great love for the poor young girl, the "white flower" of his song made him a coward; but it was a loving coward, and might go far to help him yet.

It was late when Rose returned. Grace had been sitting gloomily alone in the room, where shaded lamplight and flooding moonlight, pouring through the window wide door, made the place a bower of golden dusk.

Tossing aside her hat and little white shawl, Rose flung herself on this floor at her sister's feet. Grace placed her loving hand on this soft, brown, curling locks veiling the bright head.

"Did you have a happy day?"

"Oh, yes," was the answer with magnificent indifference.

"And—was Ray there?"

"Way—you mean old Way, the hand master, of course he was there. He could there be a brass band without Mr. Way to lead it?" replied Miss Rose.

Grace touched with a finger of gentle reproach the naughty lips of friend. Green, that I am tired of it and must get a new one somewhere."

"Rose, I can't bear to hear you talk like that, and you in your prime! The pale, sweet face of the older sister had grown pale still. "Oh, ah! how beautiful! How can we thank you, Ray I Oh! why was I not born a flower—just a white rose like this! Then I should not have to trouble about a new dress. Now, Miss Grace Wilmot!"

"Oh, Rose! How could you do so! And Ray is so kind." There were tears ready to break through the trouble of Grace's pained voice.

"Kind!" broke in Rose, indignantly. "I call it far from kind to annoy me so, and, after all, I don't think he would have minded it much—a very much—but a slight shower came down while we were dancing, and we all rushed back to the pavilion."

Here Miss Rose paused again. A dimpling smile stole into her round, rosy cheek.

"There was a little spot of marshy ground on the path, and the rain had made it worse. So, when we came to that—you see, I had on my light shoes—Merlin threw down his coat, and nothing would do but I must walk over it. And when I looked up, just as we entered the pavilion, what do we present there was on Raymond's face! I thought he would have fainted. We must at once go home, and I was obliged to wear a parcel fear at her heart. What could she do? How could she chide the thoughtless young creature, who was so dear, so simple, so early of love? How could she help and not hurt?

Grace had unclasped Rose authoritatively growing tired of the allusion.

"My dear," and Grace, timidly, "don't you think with me that Mr. Wells's attention was a little out of place—that it was presumptuous?"

Miss Rose overshadowed no reply to this.

"Don't you think, dear, you might have reached the pavilion safely, as the others did, simply by walking on the grass?"

"I am tired and sleepy. I must go to bed, and Rose suddenly getting up.

Then she glanced at Grace's face.

"Sulky" she commanded. "Do you think I am going to say good night to such eyes as these? Smile at once."

The pained look melted swiftly into tears. With loving arms twined around each other's neck, the two sisters cried silently. But their good-night kiss was the sweeter for those tears.

In the quiet days that followed—perhaps because they were living nearer together, more in sympathy with each other—Grace noticed that Rose was more thoughtful, more silent, that under her gay laugh abroad the glamour of something tender. Her fancy detected that Grace grew more thin and pale, but that her strength seemed to increased.

One evening Grace, who had gone to Communion that morning, drew Rose to her. The young girl came and knelt by her side in the twilight, and, with the pretty brown ringlets ruffling over her lap, the sweet face hidden in sight upthrown.

"Rose," and the elder sister, in a low voice, "you never sing for me now."

"No," answered Rose slowly. "it must be I don't know—silent—I don't think of it."

"You did not want once to think of it, Rose; you used to sing because you must."

"Yes, that does make a difference—to feel the same in one. When a bird is big cooked and eaten, I suppose it does not sing."

"What in the world do you mean child? Rose? Nothing—I never mean anything; that's why I get into so much trouble.

The girl spoke in a careless way, but a moment after she spoke more seriously

"Do you know, Grace I was reading this morning, the old story of the knightly one, who had "sacrificed himself that his lady moreted. He was very poor, but he would not sell his lord. Hot, one fine day, the Princess sent a message to that she as one thing to dine with him, and, as he had nothing in his house fit for a dainty a lady, he bade his cook kill the bird and serve it."

Here Rose paused for a moment, for a sound as of tears was in her voice. She put her face down over her eyes.

"It is such a story, Grace, I can't tell it and enjoy it as I should. But the young knight must have sat and looked at her—can I you fancy it?—while she sat at his table and ate the tragic dinner—and then—she said she would love him—he his own true Princess and he would give her his hand."

"Well," said Grace, sniffing, "the Princess did get the bird in one way, if not in another. And I wonder if the young knight ever regretted when he saw her eating it."

"Oh, not—hard hearted—supposing she had taken his tribute in vain to make a fire for us, if I were freezing."

Grace began to understand.

The next day Miss Wilmot was not so well. She was lying on the sofa in the little room, when Rose came in and knelt by her, and took both her hands. The girl had a strange look and feeling, as if she were in a wood, with no one to show her the way out.

"I don't know what to do for you," she sobbed. "You are getting worse, Grace, and I shall have to send for some one I don't why does not Ray—"

She stopped suddenly, but Grace heard, and the next day, a message found its way to the young man, who answered it in person.

He walked straight up to Grace's chair when he came in.

"I did not know you were ill," he said, and, in the sense of consolation of rest, the the invalid felt when she heard his voice—"I shall have to be your nurse, I see, if anything ailed I am sorry."

Grace smiled faintly but in grave gravs with a startled fear when he saw the change in her.

"It is not painful—only a little troublesome, and I should not mind it so much, but Rose is so alone."

Raymond looked for the first time at Rose, who was sitting apart, by a window. She barely glanced up as she spoke, but the pained look melted swiftly into tears. With loving arms twined around each other's neck, the two sisters cried silently. But their good-night kiss was the sweeter for those tears.

"Grace"—and the pretty girl took that pale, quivering face in her two slim hands—"you thought I was in earnest! You thought I could take that money! You could think so badly as that of me! No I will never joka again. I will always be in real earnest. I have noticed before now that I get into a great deal of trouble because of my foolish habit of joking. And now—now kiss me.

Wee not that sad-faced, gentle young woman, with the tears not quite vanished from her own eyes, proved to touch with soft caress the round cheek turned so pretty toward her!

"You know how pretty way of joking makes one of my greatest pleasures," she answered, "and I am a foolish woman, but if you want the dress—"

"Willed do mir nicht einen kiss gehen! said a clear voice from the open window. Both of the girls turned. A pleasant face—blonde, with a blonde beard, and pleasant blue eyes smiling from under thick waves of curling, fair hair—was peering at them.

"Oh, Raymond, is it you?" two voices spoke together. This smiling apparition, Raymond Brent, held out a dewy hand of flowers—all green leaves, white fleshy and ruby tendrils. Their exquisite fragrance filled the room.

"It is my contribution," he said, flushing behind the curtain that he pushed back with one hand. "I got them as I came along, at Floyda'."

"Ah, ah! how beautiful! How can we thank you, Ray I Oh! why was I not born a flower—just a white rose like this! Then I should not have to trouble about a new dress. Now, Miss Grace Wilmot!"

This nice eyes of the young man had been from the first fixed on this slim, fair, flower-bed of a girl, who was hovering over his gift in an ecstacy of delight. The eyes fixed now with pleasure, as she took a spray

STORY OF A SKELETON.

A Pitiful Chapter of Starvation, Despair and Death.

A narrow, almost impenetrable trail running along the edge of a gulch. To the left was a rather steep hill covered with bowlders, with here and there clumps of cactus, with a few gorgeous blooms of purple and one. At intervals, standing like ghostly sentinels, were the stalks of cactus, some white bloom, with its faint, but enchanting odor of the wax, and, also, perched leaves, the bodies by which the cactus wren, in order to attain to the trail. It forest there but also I have seen the cactus wren, when a parched fear at her heart. What could she do? How could she chide the thoughtless young creature, who was so dear, so simple, so early of love? How could she help and not hurt?

Grace had unclasped Rose authoritatively growing tired of the allusion.

"My dear," and Grace, timidly, "don't you think with me that Mr. Wells's attention was a little out of place—that it was presumptuous?"

Miss Rose overshadowed no reply to this.

"Don't you think, dear, you might have reached the pavilion safely, as the others did, simply by walking on the grass?"

"I am tired and sleepy. I must go to bed, and Rose suddenly getting up.

Then she glanced at Grace's face.

"Sulky" she commanded. "Do you think I am going to say good night to such eyes as these? Smile at once."

The pained look melted swiftly into tears. With loving arms twined around each other's neck, the two sisters cried silently. But their good-night kiss was the sweeter for those tears.

FIVE MINUTES WITH A MAD DOG.

A Physician in a Dark Culler with a Syringe of Hydrocyanic Acid.

Last week I received orders to go to the Hinkanin public house, Mobile, and prescribe for a dog-bite suffered by a lady. The lady master had seen the dog during his rounds, and found it to be a mad hound of state. I filled a small bottle with hydrocyanic acid, and, taking a syringe, went at once to see about it. Arriving at the house, I asked my business, and was shown at over to the pet boy to be comforted—the dog whom I could hear howling every few seconds. There being no yard in the cellar, they had chained the dog down in the office, in a staple in the wall. "It is very bad case, sir," said the guide, "and I'll be glad when it's over. I've, although he was a great pet with us all, and that kind of a lady, I'm sorry, yet, it's awful, and goes near me to have him come—dying at us. Think, sir! suffer much? There's a good lady, sir, and a good master, that!"

Assured him it would soon be over without much pain, and descending some steps we passed through a room in the basement and came to a door, with a barred window. Cases of wine and spirits were ranged against the wall, and we could hear the tramp of the thirsty shod customers in the bar-room, just beyond the door. Opening the door, we passed into another room, lighted by a single barred window in the room we had just left, as it shone through the now open door. "He's in there," said the pet boy, pointing to another door in the said opposite.

Looking there, as a window in the room, I pushed the door open, and immediately heard the rattle of a chain and the hoarse half howl, half growl of the poor beast, as he sprang at the door, and fell far wall gleaming through the dark. Within a dim was none.

"Why you said he didn't you bring a light," I asked angrily; "you don't suppose I can do business in the dark?"

"Thought I had a match," said the boy, fumbling in his pockets; "there's a cigar just inside the door."

"I had no matches on me. I sent him a piece to get some, said, wanting his return, as then on an empty keg near the door.

The dog seemed quieted for a moment, for through the doorway emerged soft disturbed howling, I pushed it to with my foot. The boy was sometimes gone (I found afterwards he had been to ask his mistress if he would like to have a last look at the old dog), and I sat thinking over the day's war of the cellar was close, and the smell of the sawdust on the floor was most unpleasant. I leaned my head on my hand against the wall or the floor, as he moved to steady his mind, wondering if I was in any errand there. Then the movement ceased for a time, or partly absorbed in my thoughts, I failed to notice it. The next thing I remember was a sudden shock against my knees. Looking down, I saw two glaring eyes just at my knee. The dog had crept up to me, and was in the act of out of the damp and yielding mortar.

I sat quite still, with a cold sweat on my forehead. Why he spared me I cannot guess. My heart seemed to stand still.

"You! No! It is nothing, only—only

And then it was all over, and Rose was sobbing her grief and joy and resentment all together on Raymond's shoulder.

He drew her than close for a little space, and then he put her out at arms length away from him.

"Willst du mir nicht einen kuss geben?" he said, laughing; and then Rose lifted her face, flushed fair, and he took her into "Liebchen," he whispered tenderly and softly, "I thought I had lost you forever, and so Raymond spoke it "Liebchen, and I shall treat you so. There is heard at her more closely. "And you have got to be husband and wife. You must at once go home, and I will wedding." Rose laughed. "Come to Grace now," she said. But she was gone.

LEGEND OF ALANUS DE INSULIS.

The Great Scholar in the Garb of a Thy Brother Confounds Heretics.

Among the many distinguished theologians who flourished during the Middle Ages, was Alanus de Insulis. He was deeply versed in theology, and taught with great renown in the University of Paris. A memorable legend, which has been transmitted down to the several centuries, is related of him. He had announced that on a given day he would preach on the Trinity, and a great concourse of people assembled to hear the mystery. On the appointed day he ascended the pulpit, and prepared to preach, as he was engaging a military man with a book of assemblyman, he held a little key suspended out a small branch in the hand and, opening it, fill it with water taken from the stream, with a which he sprinkled the people, on some chalk asked Alanus, "Can you tell me what is the water of the river and my branch, was the chalk?" "Why, of course I can," said the great theologian, "that you will second the great design." "Then you must also perform what you have engaged today." What have I undertaken?" "Why, to send a man and a man with explain the Trinity." Alanus was filled with amazement at the proposition and hesitated. He retorted, in his mind, the man was a fool, and, in the words of the child and requesting his own attention, he begin to explain the Trinity. Alanus was astonished a great crowd had assembled to witness the result of the proposition, and preaching he uttered these words: "It is the mystery of the Trinity, which I will explain to you." The man, on immediately withdrew to the stream, and, with the branch, he sprinkled the water upon the chalk. The man, after a few minutes, returned to the pulpit and, with a smile, exclaimed, "Behold! I have fulfilled my part of the agreement." Alanus, who remained in a long reverie, emerging himself with the duties of shepherd.

Time passed on, and after many years, Alanus, who had become old, was called upon to Rome, and Alanus accompanied him to the city. When the boat left the shore, he was seized with a violent attack of the ague, and was compelled to land at a little town, which was the seat of a great university. The university was in a state of great excitement, for the heretics had invaded the district with the Albigensian doctrines. The heretics, at one moment appeared in the university, and challenged the Alanus, a Catholic, to a public discussion. Alanus, who was still suffering from the ague, was compelled to accept the challenge. The heretics, at one moment appeared in the university, and, with a smile, exclaimed, "Behold! I have fulfilled my part of the agreement."

THE MONITOR.

TWENTY-SIXTH YEAR OF PUBLICATION.

The MONITOR has the largest circulation of any Religious Paper published on the Pacific Coast.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1885.

THE ILLUSTRATED CHRISTMAS MONITOR.

In accordance with our annual custom we will present our readers with a twelve page illustrated MONITOR AT CHRISTMAS, and we desire to inform all press and pointed writers, therefor, that their contributions must reach this office not later than the feast of the Immaculate Conception [December 8th] so as to enable us to get out our very large edition—the CHRISTMAS MONITOR will have to go to press on December 15th, so as to reach all sections of the Union by Christmas Day. Persons who desire extra copies to send to friends can have them mailed free, direct from this office, by sending in—at any time between now and Christmas—the addresses of those to whom they wish copies sent, accompanied with 10 cents in coin or stamps for each copy thus ordered for friends in the Eastern States or Europe. The CHRISTMAS MONITOR will be a most acceptable present to send to friends far away from those who dwell along the Pacific Coast, and we hope that hundreds of our subscribers will avail themselves of this liberal offer.

Editorial Notes.

—A Catholic magazine, in reviewing the work of the Society of Jesus, counts up 3,562 Jesuits engaged in missionary work. They have 1,500 stations and are said to have converted last year 9,000 adult heathens.

—We wish every Catholic and non-Catholic in America could be indoned to read the magnificent essay written by Archbishop Gibbons which we print on our first page this week. It is, decidedly, the best contribution that American literature has yet produced on the subject-matter whereof it treats. Every subscriber to the MONITOR will add greatly to his stores of knowledge by giving it a careful perusal.

—Bishop Richter, of Grand Rapids, Michigan, was compelled to issue a circular letter to his clergy and people, warning them against an impostor representing himself as a priest, and going about performing clerical duties, collecting money, etc., in that diocese. This species of impostors is becoming only too common over the country, and our[kind Catholic people cannot be too strict in demanding recognition from their immediate Pastor of the claims set up by those coming among them to collect.

—The sole personal estate that the late Cardinal McCloskey left after him was an insurance policy in the Mutual Life of New York. All the vast property that was held by him for the church and the poor was held in trust to the Archbishop-elect, the Bishop of Brooklyn and the Bishop of Albany, his executors. Compare such a testament with that, for example, of the Protestant Archbishop of Armagh, or a Protestant Archbishop of Canterbury, claiming to be a Christian minister.

—We are in receipt of the New Mexico Methodist, with a request for an exchange, which we cheerfully comply with, for the reason that the Methodists of New Mexico will learn through the MONITOR how very wicked their Wesleyan brethren are heretofore, and thus they will have a better idea of the inner workings of that iniquitious system of sectarianism. The motto of the new Methodist paper is "Let there be Light," and we mean to turn the full glare of the MONITOR's electric head-light upon it whenever it says anything untrue concerning the Catholic Church.

—The letter which we print from Michael Davitt this week brings cheering news to every native and friend of Ireland on the Pacific coast. The prospect for dear old Ireland's freedom was never more favorable, and it is very consoling to have the one-armed patriot refute—over his own signature—the malignant reports of "disaffection" and "disunion" in the Irish ranks circulated by English influences all over America. With Parnell, Davitt, and the other Irish patriots united in one effort to free Ireland, we may rest assured hope that we shall yet see the flag of "Home Rule" will float over Dublin Castle.

—The Chicago Interior is a non-Catholic paper, but it is liberal enough not to close its eyes to the truth all the time. Commenting on the love for "millinery" which all the new fledged Protestant preachers manifest, the Interior says: "As soon as the proda "Rev." is added to their name, these gospel goslings make a bee-line such for their girl, and is soon, by wedlock, impoverished, honeycomb, for say earliest missionary labor." Here is where the Catholic Church manifested her wisdom by establishing the rule of celibacy. The followers of Luther, on the other hand, are not worth "mocks" unless they have a female to accompany them in their missionary tours and to put molasses into the fresh-and-milk sermons they preach to empty pews on Sundays!

—Lourdes—which has become known as a holy shrine to Catholics all over the world—contains a population of four or five thousand, and has five convents, an immense large hospital, two schools and two churches, one being a basilica built over the miraculous Grotto. The basilica, built to hold 2,000 persons, is a Gothic structure of surpassing beauty; a church which is to hold 6,000 persons, and which will perhaps surpass the former in beauty, is now building immediately in front of it. The basilica contains fifteen side chapels and a crypt-basement, all of which as well as the basilica itself are superbly decorated with thousands upon thousands of votive, royal presents and 400 banners. That of the United States, conspicuously mounted, is to the left of the main altar.

—Simultaneously with the death of Cardinal McCloskey, there departed this life a man who was once honored as a priest, but whose pride caused his downfall. The unfortunate man in question is Dr. John Murray Forbes, a convert from the Episcopal church, who was a priest in New York, but who became a pervert because he thought his "talents" were not sufficiently recognized in the Catholic Church. He was 78 years old when he died, but, like Luther and other fallen priests, he was foolish enough to marry a young wife a few years ago, and now comes news that he has to pay the penalty of his folly.

—A recent cablegram from London says that Cardinal Manning and fourteen other British Catholic Bishops have issued a manifesto denouncing mixed education." It is impossible, the manifesto says, for Catholics to accept education when it is divorced from religion. Free education is tantamount to a State monopoly of education. Christianity will be imperiled unless the State subsidies religious and secular schools equally. This is gratifying news to American Catholics, and we hope the efforts of the Catholic Prelacy both in Europe and America, in order to obtain even handed justice for Catholics, may speedily be crowned with success.

—The English State Church established by King Henry VIII., is gradually losing its preachers who are showing their good sense by coming over to the Catholic Church. The latest convert is that distinguished "Rev. Owen King, curate of Leigh, Kent." Mr. King, who held his flock that he could teach error no longer, but was going to enter Christ's True Fold. The Rev. C. W. S. Morrill, rector of St. James' Episcopalian Church, Woonsocket, Rhode Island, whose conversion we published last month, is about entering the Roman Catholic Church, and will shortly be ordained a priest. Thus, every act of devotion we perform for the suffering souls in Purgatory is pleasing to God because our prayers and the Holy Sacrifice have the power to people heaven through God's mercy, and also to gratify the longing desire of many a poor father, mother, sister, brother, friend or relative, to be released from their sins. Such souls are overflowing with gratitude, and the little sacrifices we make for them on earth will be returned to us a thousand fold by their fervent and acceptable prayers for us in their eternal abode with God!

Extraordinary Jubilee Next Year.

An official communication dated "First Vespers of the Most Holy Rosary, October 3rd, 1885," and signed by the Cardinal Vicar of Rome, was published in the Osservatore Romano of the 3rd ult., in which it is proclaimed that his Holiness Leo XIII., moved by a desire to provide in these exceptional times extraordinary incentives to devotion, has been graciously pleased to accord in the coming year, 1886, to the entire Catholic world, an extraordinary Jubilee. His Holiness—in his ardent love for the Mother of God—intends to place this Jubilee under the special patronage of the Blessed Virgin Mary, Queen of Heaven, hence the Pope promulgated the Decree on the eve of the festival on which she crushed the head of the serpent, the glorious and ever Immaculate Mother of God is honored by the Church under the title of "Our Lady of the Holy Rosary."

Is this a Specimen of Methodist Christianity?

We have often given in these columns specimens of the spleen indulged in by Protestant preachers whenever the Host below infused a fraction of his diabolical hatred of the Catholic Church and its immortal regions, but in our last issue we have a specimen of Christian charity which we believe is just three times as bad as any previous specimen of the spirit of Methodism that we have ever encountered in our long career as a critic of sectarianism. Here is the editorial in question:

DEAR FRIEND.—An honorable (?) member of the Legislature, one other day, attempted a Sunday night on sight, not long since.

We hope no reader of the MONITOR will think for a moment that this "dog-gone" specimen of Methodist literature ever emanated from the fervid brain of our esteemed friend

Rev. Brother McCrary
From sweet Tipperary.

No! The veteran editor of the Advocate possesses far too kindly a heart to use such a ruffianly comparison regarding any Christian—no matter how great never a sinner he might be even in the eyes of the Methodist elect. Dr. Crary says in the same issue of his paper that "Scar godliness is a vous than muddy sourdough," hence we know that the capacious mind which could formulate such a linguistic combination of vulgar and vegetation, is far too charitable to call his fellow-men canines.

Of course we must hold Methodism accountable for this shocking breach of all Christian charity, but our acquaintance with the genial gentleman who edits the Advocate leads us to believe that he could—under any circumstances—pen such poisonous lines for his paper, the crime would be committed under the influence of his unfortunate early training in Methodism rather than from any impulse of his head or his heart. As a Christian we blush at such brutal expressions, and we hope our Methodist confreres will hereafter guard his columns from any more such ungodly allusions to his fellow-man.

What a vast contrast is presented when we compare previous Catholic Christianity with that hope system of religion based on sectarianism! Here is a Methodist paper degrading men down to "dogs" because they attended a canine conflict on the Sabbath. Such is not the way our Blessed Redeemer reproved sinners, nor is it the mode pursued by the Vicar of Christ. It is reported that fully 20,000 Catholics were massacred in China during the recent turmoils and revolutions, and the attention of the Sovereign Pontiff Pope Leo XIII., having been called thereto, he wrote a letter of remonstrance to the Emperor of China, in which he neither called him a murderer or a "pagan dog." On the contrary, the Vicar of Christ, filled with that charity which is the mark of true Christianity, pleads with the Emperor for his Catholic people, and closes his edifying epistle by appealing to the Emperor under whose jurisdiction 28,000 Pirates, Sisters and Catholic Chinese converts had been massacred in cold blood: "Meanwhile we beg of God, Whose love is infinite and aeth, to grant you abundance of the spirit of wisdom and of counsel." Contrast this with the Methodist malice and the Catholic charity of the Pope of Rome, and the one degrades Christianity down to the very "dogs" it defames, whilst the other brings every Christian back to that memorable closing scene in the life of our Blessed Redeemer on Calvary, when He said of His executioners "Forgive them Father, for they know not what they do!" Such divine Catholic Church! How grandly the divine origin stands out in contrast with the vitiated sepulchers of sectarianism, whose mission the greatest of virtues is called into play in order to convince the world that God still lives in His Church, and wherein He manifests His mercy to man.

Approaching Canonizations.

A semi-official organ of the Holy Father in Rome announces that ten Causes of Beatification will be decided during the coming Sacerdotal Jubilee of Leo XIII. in 1887; among them are those of the Venerable John Baptist La Salle, Clement Hofbauer, and the Spanish Augustinian Nun, Inos di Benigamin. At the same time the Canonization will take place of three already Blessed members of the Society of Jesus—Fathers Peter Claver, John Berchmans, and the Lay Brother Alfonso Rodriguez. Last year, the intimate friend of Blessed Peter Claver, and himself Beatified by Leo XII. in 1721, was, before his entrance into the Society, a man of wealth and station. He has left manuscript writings of a high spiritual order, which are now being collected and published in Spanish by Father Jaime Nonell, S. J., of the province of Spain. The work will embrace three volumes, in 8vo., one of which Vol. 1., of 800 pages, has been already given to the public. It contains a fine portrait of Blessed Alfonso Rodriguez—a steel engraving by the celebrated artist Heaton. Of the three decisive miracles selected for the Canonization of Blessed Peter Claver, two were wrought in this country, and one of the three chosen as the final test in the cause of Blessed John Berchmans, was also wrought in the New World in 1866, and accompanied by the apparition, with a prophecy of the Saint, the latter since verified, in favor of a young Novice of the Community of the Ladies of the Sacred Heart, located at Grand Coteau, Louisiana.

—It is now definitely stated from Washington that General Grant's daughter, Mrs. Sartoris, is about to separate from her English husband. This is not wonderful. Mr. Sartoris is reported to have all the worst characteristics of the bullying Brutalist, without any of the redeeming qualities which, sometimes, make an American, or an Irishman, forgot an Englishman's cruelty. In short, Sartoris is not an English gentleman in the accepted sense of the word. When Miss Grant married Sartoris, she married her back on several hundred thousand true hearted American young men, any one of whom would make her life happy. A man who could show around the latters of his Kanon, as Sartoris is said to have done at a hotel in Wisconsin village, is too coarse a creature to be the husband of an American lady.

A Flagellation for Dr. D. McFall.

It is safe to say that not a dozen readers of the MONITOR ever heard of

That preacher of gospel and gall
The bishop-baited Dr. McFall, who holds forth after an unusually fanatical fashion to the Chambers' street church, Boston, where he has—since Mr. Lyman's death—no sinners and no matter. Some time ago, we learn about the big bow-wow of bigotry thereof, the Christian owner of Chicago—the organ of a Protestant association that is trying to establish Protestantism as the national religion of America by an amendment to the Federal Constitution. Dr. David McFall is inflated with some strange gospel, and concerning the Catholic Church, and as his gas-bag was in good running order a few Sundays ago, the gaspiling wrestler with the Church of God enlightened his highly "cultured" audience on that memorable occasion by thus discoursing after his own diabolical fashion concerning the Bride of Christ. Alluding to the Quixotic idea which this gospel Gothic entertains regarding a mythical union which he thinks exists between Catholics and infidels—as against Protestants of all shades and sects—this long-tongued Reverend (?) gospel-gabber went on to say:

Among the monitory schools which are doing what such a Church is the front rank with the best, St. Mary's Academy. In this only, and in its place, the Church has lately gone back two ways, several years ago. It has given with the only child now by seventy four girl boarders, twenty-eight boy boarders, eighty girl day scholars and fifty boy day scholars. In the original main building there was added last year a new wing for exclusively Protestant boarders. The year another great wing was added, and the Protestant boarders in the main building there was added last year a new wing for exclusively Protestant boarders. The year another great wing was added, and the Protestant boarders in the main building there was added last year a new wing for exclusively Protestant boarders. The building has also been provided with two chapels, one for Protestants, the other for Catholics. The Protestant chapel, we are sorry to have to say, is not used, as we are assured, to guard against any entire alienation of children. There is perfect entire harmony and a chance around is every thing that the whole school is assembled, in a monumental affinity of the highest order. Every thing is teaching that a decided assembly in the foremost high schools of the Union, particular Protestant, and Christian, and Catholic, and so on to the most sought after accomplishments of the Christian Lady, and Mary and Jesus and Christ. The Church is to be limited to be entirely Christian, and Christ is to be in her there, for fashioning to be her Christ, and Christ is to be in her there, for fashioning to be her Christ, and Christ is to be in her there, for fashioning to be her Christ

Farm and Home.

Maxims to Make Life Happy.

— Force yourself to reflect upon what you read, paragraph by paragraph.

— Don't think too much importance on the things of this life, they are all passing.

— The secret of success in life is for a man to be ready for the opportunity when it comes.

— Children are travelers newly arrived in a strange country; we should therefore endeavor not to mislead them.

— Never all that you can; spend not all that you have; believe not all that you hear; and tell not all that you know.

— Those though in highest place, who might and doubtless their friends, shall infallibly come to know the value of them, by having none when they shall most need them.

— Caution in crediting, reserve in speaking, and in revealing one's self to a very few, are the best securities both of peace and a good understanding with the world, and to the inward peace of our own minds.

— Always speak kindly and politely to those under you. If you want them to do anything for you ask them and not order them. They will respect and love you, and be much more willing to wait upon you.

— The happy gift of being agreeable seems to exhaust not in one but in an assemblage of talents tending to communicate delight; and how many are there, who, by variety of other undeniable qualities, possess the power of pleasing without any visible effort, yet with the aids of wit, wisdom, or learning, nay, as it may seem, in their defiance; and this without appearing even to know that they possess it.

— How much of life is wasted in unfinished work! Many a man uses up his time in splendid beginnings. The labor devoted to commencing ten things and leaving them useless would finish five of them and make them profitable and useful. Finish your work. Life is brief, time is short. Stop beginning forty things, and go back and finish four. Put patient, persistent toil into the matter, and, be assured, one completed undertaking will yield yourself more pleasure and the world more profit than a dozen fair plans of which people will say: "This man began to build and was not able to finish." "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might."

Good Work, or None.

It is a rule that a workman must follow his employer's orders, but no one has a right to make him do work discreditable to himself. Judge M——, a well-known jurist, tells a story near Cincinnati, lored to tell this anecdote of a young man who understood the risk of doing a shabby job even when directed to. He had occasion once to send to the village after a carpenter, and a sturdy young fellow appeared with his tools:

"I want this fence mended to keep out the cattle. There are some unplaned boards — see them. It is cut from the home, and you need not take time to make a neat job of it. I will only pay you a dollar and a half."

The judge then went to dinner, and coming out found the man carefully planing each board. Supposing that he was trying to make a costly job of it, he ordered him to stop and come at once just as they were, and continued his walk. When he returned, the boards were all planed and sandpapered, ready for nailing.

"I said you should have mended it, he exclaimed, in astonishment.

"Yes, sir," he said angrily, "I do not care how it looks.

"Why, I made the great mistake of my life in my first overtime."

"What did you do? Let her go for a richer one?"

"No sirree."

"Then how in thunder did you make such a dreadful mistake?"

"Married her, my boy, married her!" he said, disconsolately, and hurried along with his market basket.

A Public-Spirited Citizen.

Jim McSnitter was tried in the district court at San Antonio, Texas, for stealing a horse. After speeches were made, the case was given to the jury, and while the jury was in the bench, the foreman of the jury

"The jury will now retire and deliberate on a verdict."

The foreman got up on his feet and addressed the court: "Yer honor, I'm the jury in this account. You can just stay right here and discuss the matter. In fact, I'd like to be present and help you make up your verdict. I want to do all I can to expedite justice."

The jury, nevertheless, retired, but after several hours they returned, being unable to agree upon a verdict.

Once more the prisoner arose in his seat and addressed the jury:

"Gentlemen, as far as I am concerned a few years more or less in the penitentiary is a matter of no importance. If you can agree on five years, make it ten. I don't want to have it said about me that I objected the course of justice or that I didn't have my public spirit."

How it Works.

The New York custom house civil service doctors had three separate examinations all going on at the same time, the other day. They first disposed this qualification of twenty candidates who want appointment from Appraiser McMillen as examiner of silks, worsteds and woollens, at $2500 per annum. Twelve candidates were examined for sugar samplers and thirty men for assistant gangers, who are paid $3 a day.

The applicants for assistant gangership were asked to do a little copying and to solve some simple examples in arithmetic. Several men declined the task. To one of the theoretical questions, "What is gauging?" one man replied, "To take a drink."

Another said that "proof," when applied to spirits, meant "pure." One question was:

"What is the unit of a gauger when he discovers violations of the revenue laws?" Too severe was, "To go to Washington."

How She Caught Him.

"Philander," said a pretty girl to her bashful beau, "I wish you'd tie this ribbon at my throat. I can's see how to do it without a glass." "Oh course I'll be too glad to," hesaid, and at once grappled the stronger. After an unsuccessful effort of five minutes, during which he got as red as a brick house and perspired like a pitcher of ice water on a July window sill, he stammered, "I—I don't think I can do it properly, Miss Mary." "Suppose, Philander," she whispered, with a pretty little blush, "suppose you call in a preacher to assist." Like the unveiling of a beautiful mystery the situation unfolded itself to Philander, and he feels better now.

How Gotham Honors Grant.

Raising $1,000,000 for a monument in New York to General Grant is rather uphill work. Some of the rich people who talk loudest about building the monument immediately, contribute very sparingly. They remind one of a farmer who, on being approached by the agent of a proposed railroad, exclaimed vociferously:

"I tell you I'm in favor of railroads first last and all the time. If railroads are a striking influence, they cause the waste places to blow as the rose. I tell you you can put me down as a man who will help to build a railroad."

The agent was delighted. As the farmer was rich, the agent suggested that the farmer would take about $50,000 worth of stock, so he took out his books and asked:

"How much stock shall I put you down?"

"Wal," said the farmer, "I suppose you can put me down for 10 cents, if it runs near my farm."

That is about as much stock as some of the wealthy New Yorkers take in the Grant monument.

Tom Corwin's Watermelon.

Several famous writers and orators of Boston were speaking of their lecture experiences, when the subject of pay was brought up. Each was certain he had received the smallest compensation. Finally one made a climax by saying "Listen, gentlemen. I had engaged to give a lecture for $5. After it was all over a grave-looking deacon came to me and said 'Mr. Holmes, we agreed to give you $5, but your talk wasn't just what we expected, and I guess we ought to give you $4.'"

This is hardly equal to the experience of Corwin, the famous Ohio orator. He once occasion he visited a hamlet and gave his services in a rousing political speech. A large White audience was continuous in applause, and a series of long drawn resolutions commending the party and particularly the speaker, prolonged the meeting until far into the night, keeping the eloquent Corwin until long after his regular time for retiring. Finally he escaped from the dismal drone of "whereas," and "resolved," and sought his room in the hotel. He had been asleep about an hour when he was aroused by a loud knocking at his chamber door.

Upon opening the door, the lately aroused sleeper discovered one of the headlights of the late meeting holding in his hand a bundle of resolutions, and at his feet lay a huge watermelon. The individual hung up the resolutions, presented the melon as a token of his appreciation, and retired to his home. The next morning Corwin found the resolutions of thanks, after which he rolled watermelon into the room, announcing it as the finest in the country. Corwin, appreciating the awkward ceremony of the resolutions and the compliments of the watermelon, thanked the delegates most eloquently. The latter individual planted himself firmly in the door, when Mr. Corwin finally asked, "My good man, is there anything else that I can do for you?" "Yes, sir," slowly and solemnly responded the individual addressed, "pay me 50 cents for that watermelon."

LETTER FROM MICHAEL DAVITT.

[CONCLUDED FROM FIRST PAGE.]

Salisbury and Randolph Churchill, on the part of the Tories, hint at a possible solution of the Irish National question through a scheme for the federation of the British empire. Mr. Childers is speaking, according to general belief, the intentions of Mr. Gladstone, effort in the entire administration of the law, the control of the police, public works, the Poor law administration, the registration of the franchise, the trade department, the schools, and the universities.

Hesitation may arise in Irish minds on remembering that Ireland was under a Crimes Act for late years, and that, and that, I just Irish Nationalists care impious and a shrunk imaginary, but I can hardly, will think Mr. Childers's offer a very remarkable one. So it unquestionably is, but we can afford to wait for error better time, and they are certainly in to forecoming, if we only maintain the same persistent energy in working for them, both in Ireland and in Westminster, which has brought this minister of British statesman so far in the direction of our aims during the last six years. We are not likely to fall in doing so.

The main question is the immediate difficulty, however. How it is to be fought out this winter gives more concern to the popular leaders than does the attitude of English Whigs and Tories on the Home Rule problem. It will be the natural rather than the political forces of the Irish people which will be brought into play during the next eight months, if the landlords persist in demanding their usual pound of flesh; and such a power, when contending for the rights of the domestic heartharmes, is not easily put down in Ireland. The London Tools come up the situation so accurately in yesterday's issue that I will quote its words in preference

TO THE SUBSCRIBERS OF MY OWN:

The state of the seas is thin, and every cardinal Irish landlord says it would be impossible for him to go in the teeth of the Times' leading article. The Irish farmers can't sell their cattle. They are pressed to sell it at a loss; to sell on almost any terms, if only to avoid the expense of winter keep; but they can't sell at all. The beasts are driven from fair to fair, and no one even asks the price of them. This is the story that is coming from every part of Ireland. Not fully, then, is "call upon the Government to stand firm," and the landlords to "keep a stiff back-bone." Still, indeed! If they are stiff now, they will be stiffer when the winter comes. If they do not now know what they had better bend. The choice is not between a little rent and much, but between a little rent and none. When the Land Act was passed it was found by all concerned that prices were set at the back of their heads, that it would not prove a fair settlement. The most that was hoped for was that it would give a breathing space. But it has not even done that. The time has passed, and or than ever could have imagined. What was a "fair rent" four years ago is a "rack rent" now. Add to this that the Commissioners, as a rule, took a complete view than a dispassionate view of the prospects of Irish agriculture. The present response to the appeal to the landlords to stand or cause a panic. All the enemies in the world of Ireland, and all the friends of Ireland, are ready to the last farthing to see the Land Act amended into the little shape, bullied to hold about fifty, and it was dropped by present workingmen hopes in the house which this little company of pious asylum has made up. In order to prevent suffocation, and perhaps as accident, the Tories are obliged to let the seen into the chair and the space immediately in front of the small seat. The Irish people, they are not yet standing, darker the overcoats, or the hard Tomkins, while those in front remained seated. Their supremes and foreign rattlesnakes.

Mr. Parnell, who was received with cheers, and his friends was absent, he, as proposed, to read, on the facade of the convent, "Ad te Omnesque, exaje Gilli Gallie." "Yes," he cried, "those cries will produce their effect."

LIFE AND DEATH.

I passed through a street of tears,
And I saw the weakness was there—
Swinging his axe in the morning hours,
And falling as oak trees fall.
And ever he hung as he swung
And his mirth rang clear and high
As the tree falls, as the tree falls,
So shall it die, die, die!"

I passed through a street of smiles
The Weakness was there with him
Falling a life most fair,
And ever he sang as he wrought,
And his song soared up to the sky.
"At a time I live, as a man live,
So shall he die, die, die!"

I felt of the falling tree:
"Children of the dying file!
This was the sound he brought to me,
With bliss or bitterness rife
As the time of the forest falls
So shall it fall and lie;
And the self-sped fall of this life of mine
Must seal my fate when I die."

THE HOLY NAME OF MARY.

BY SISTER MARY ALPHONSUS.

Sing for the man whose fairness you
Was never heard to vary,
Nor pause to watch how much Yousuff say
In love and praise to Mary.

They gave her name a world-wide fame
They raised to Heaven her story,
But never could reach what God would teach
If He should tell her glory.

Who dares to say that God went wrong
The office to place Hall's reader,
Lest He should have said, "Sing day or night
As to exhibit His wonder"?

Who dares to think that God in His world shrink
Or weaken, e'er every dollar,
The Queen of Heaven, the Mother of God
And royal right of Mother?

Then, bless the man whose fairness you
Was never known to vary,
But still he write, in dazzling light,
The Holy Name of Mary.

They gave her name was a world-wide fame
They sketched from Heaven her story,
But he or he could reach what God will teach
When He shall tell her glory.

Literary Miscellany.

The Miser of the Mountain.

WRITTEN FOR THE "CATHOLIC HOME ALMANAC," BY ANNA T. SADLIER.

It was one of those wild but magnificent mountain passes which lend to the scenery of Connemara the character of grandeur. It was a vast defile separating a small inclosed bay on the one hand, from a broad and tranquil river on the other. Nestling in the shadow of this hill skirting the western side of the bay, was a group of cottages, a little settlement, which had grown up under the fostering care of a philanthropic gentleman. The cottages, for the most part, enjoyed a measure of peace and prosperity unknown in some of the outlying districts, but they apparently, from time to time, periods of the direst want.

Over the fifteen miles of intervening mountain pass above, the fishermen were accustomed to transport their wares to the thriving towns which bordered the river beyond. Yet few of them were venturesome enough to encounter its perils after nightfall. It was a wild and desolate and traditions ascribed to it a supernatural origin. It was said that for up its steepest point, a saint had, at some prehistoric time, built a bridge for his convenience, and was in a fray encounter with the Evil One, that he had frayed out this passage through the rocks.

It was the afternoon of the 17th of October, when our simple story opens, and it was very evident that a storm was about to burst upon the mountains.

The sky was dark and lurid, the sun was over the bay, lurid lights made a sickening glare. The bay itself was deadly pale, and the air was strangely thick and oppressive. At the very moment the story opens, just when traditions had placed of old the dwelling of the saint, stood a hut rudely constructed of shingles, and thatched with turf. A single window or aperture, guiltless of glass, looked upon the ghostly solitude without, while a single chair, and a comfortless bed stared a little misery occupant within. He was an old man, weighed down as well by years as by some grovelling instinct that made him seek the earth. His course has an gathered up almost completely from sight, by a cap which fitted close upon his head, ending in a peak at the back. His outer garment was a loose coat or gown, of a dull greenish brown, drawn in by a cord at the waist, and covered with a shaggy cape on shoulders. His eyes gleamed fire from under his shaggy brows, his lips, thin and shrivel lied, had all but lost their resemblance to any human feature. He sat, as it were, absorbed in some sinister thing. It was only when he rose that a slight deformity became apparent, a small hump upon the back, that was almost entirely concealed by the loose garment he wore. He got upstairs deeply, muttering to himself, as he did so, and rubbing the palm of one hand against the other in a slow, meditative way. Thus muttering, he approached an corner of the hut, and behold the storm which had burst with terrific fury. Blinding sheets of flame swept over the heights, and quivered upon the blackness of the waters below. They seemed to rend the heavens asunder, threatening thus both upon each other with blindness. The rocks looked pale, as if awed by the fierceness of the contending elements. The mountains, hid in gloom, seemed a silent, fearful barrier to the arrds around them. The unceasing roar of the hut looked out upon the scene an instant, then burst into a shriek of merriment that had something more fearful in it than the howling of the storm.

"Here it lies safe enough," he chuckled, "clean starvation to them. Not a boat will be able to get out for days to come, and those that are out'll be dashed to pieces as I'm a sinner. More wrecks. I had a feast of them last week there. 'tch Denis Mahoney, I have you now."

As he spoke, he drew in and out his long, claw-like fingers, with a hideous gesture of appropriation.

"When I was a bit of a gossoon," he went on, "I used to hear the old people sitting around the hearth, sleevin' and talkin', bad cess to them silly tongues, about the good people, and the gentry, and the leprechaun, that dug up pots of gold out of the earth. But divil a leprechaun at all I'd see, if they spoke of him."

He shook his head and smiled at the thought.

"Is the handfuls o' crisp Bank of Ireland notes I'll be getting, and possession of a hut of cottage and mabbe a boat or two, if there's any left, thrown into the bargain."

He clapped his hands, shouted for very glee, making a hideous spectacle, in the gloom that was fast shutting out every object. "And that could scandhaun of a mother of his, spending weeks at the end, 'making her soul' at Lough Derg, and praying that all might go well with the failing."

His words were drowned in a deafening peal of thunder that seemed to split the very mountains in twain. But the being within the hut continued his soliloquy with perfect composure, apparently impervious to fear.

"If once I get my clutches on Mahoney's place," he said, "I'm thinking I'll have to move down there, and then mabbe they'll give up calling me 'The Miser of the Mountain.' Cormac 'll be a great man, then, and

With a cackling laugh, he withdrew into the interior of the cabin, seating himself once more, at intervals, on a chair of antiquity, his dull eyes fixed upon the fire-hearth, and his hands working nervously.

Down in the little fishing settlement there was trouble and uncertainty. The day had been but upon the previous night with hands of fish, their owners in most cases barely escaping with their lives. The peasant storms had been of serious injury to the fishing. Want was staring many of the cottagers in the face. In the immediate vicinity of Mahoney, positive consternation prevailed. The effects of the storm had been particularly disastrous to the head of the house, who was the owner of several boats, and one of the most heavily involved in the losses of the previous night. He knew that it meant sheer ruin to him.

"Well, it does the like the heart out of one and no mistake, avourneen, and his mother from her grave, close to the hearth, that was always to be seen there, a sainty little body, with a placid, somewhat wrinkled face, framed in a close fitting cap. She was long past going out, even to church, and her limbs were failing her so that she could only walk a few steps at a time.

"I'll run in out and out, mother," said Denis, his face pale and haggard with the lonnaghtt-water, and the harrowing anxiety. "Three boats gone, two more unfit for use, and not a handful o' fish for the market."

"Whisht to be done at all," said Delia Mahoney, his wife, wringing her hands in distress.

"But that's little to what is to come," continued Denis: "sure, if it weren't for the savings out o' that old idiot, Cormac, me mind 'd be almost easy. The day I'm night I'd come to, and I'd find hard and it, but, all the good ever out his world shaken

"Cormac!" exclaimed the other mother, speaking from her corner with the tolerness, which old age, alone can give. It seems as if the old lose the keen pangs of earthly woe, to gain a deeper insight into heavenly ones. Thirty years ago, she had voice to the old woman's proposition, but the reality of it was more distant to her than to her. Small as the cottage was, it had a look of comfort. The hut was well overhead were lit with the red glare of the turf fire burning on the broad hearth, clean swept, and always warm. The children, with their grainy told them it must be kept clean for the good people to come down the chimney at night. The wooden settle, and the three legged stools, and crockpots, as well as the rude table in the middle of the floor were white as the driest sand. Here and there a net, or portions of fishing tackle, as well as the dried fish, hanging in string overhead, seemed to point to the owner's occupation.

"Sorrigh, the ways o' God are wonderful," went on Denis sadfully, "that he would let strike that old scoundrel on the sea, along with a thunderbolt, and he so high up there, close to the clouds!"

"It's a shame for a thoi-fearin' man like yourself, Denis," said his mother, energetically, from the chimney corner, "to be heard speakin' thet way, and foremost the children too."

"It's myself hardly knows what I'm saying at all, mother," said Denis, ashamed by the rebuke. "My head's that dazed, and my heart's like sore. To think o' the man swoopin' down here like a vulture on us, and all my sarrun's gone, and nothing to the fire."

He fairly broke down and sobbed aloud.

"Denis sacrifice, you have tried, and his wife, laying her hand affectionately upon his shoulder. "Don't take the loss to heart, now, agra, for it breaks my heart.

"God is good, acushla," said the mother, speaking from her corner with the tolerness, which old age, alone can give. It seems as if the old lose the keen pangs of earthly woe, to gain a deeper insight into heavenly ones. Thirty years ago, I used to the old woman's proposition, but the reality of it was more distant to me than to her. Small as the cottage was, it had a look of comfort. "God is heaven, grra, a-ruinnagh, son of my heart," said is mother, "think o' Him that sends you the sore trial."

Two children, Mary and John, who were playing in the hut, looked up at the mention of their eldest brother, Cormac, who was at sea, and Mary, who was the more advanced of the two, ventured to inquire if it was possible that Cormac could be in the storm.

"Is it possible, my faithful Denis," he asked at last, "is this what you have seen to, and I never knew it?"

The poor face fairly beamed with joy.

"Mr. Charlie, he cried out, "I had never dared ask you for it. It is my poor mother's prayers, and to think I could have doubted the good Lord! Sure, I'm a bad man, I'm that bad, the pains of death may come on me this minute!"

At Mr. O'Byrne's request he went into all the details of their sad plight, to which the young man listened with deep compassion. Old Mrs. Mahoney had been his nurse, and Denis and he brought up almost like brothers.

"Poor old Molly is gone," he said, the tears gathering in his eyes, "the truest, most faithful creature, God ever put on earth. To think of such misery as you and I wasting time and money in Paris but cheer up, Denis, my man, its all right now. The old place shall be secured to you, and I'll have the doctor here in a minute, as soon as I get rid of this brute in the kitchen."

"May the music of the Lord light you into heaven, Mr. Charlie," said Denis, the tears streaming down his face, and using in his gratitude, the poetical expression in vogue in that part of the country, "'twas you was always the good friend to the poor, and to the widow, and to the fatherless, God bless that's gone."

The getting rid of old Cormac was a pretty expensive proceeding for Mr. O'Byrne, but he managed it, nevertheless. In a month from that time, the Mahoneys were in a fair way to be comfortable as they had ever been. Holding the lease of the farm from Mr. O'Byrne, at an almost nominal rent, the lease required and said one or two more purchased, prosperity seemed to shine on them once more. Only there was a shadow on the corner near the hearth, and a sadness in Mary's and Denis's face, in the long, lingering gaze, full of a peace that no trouble had ever observed.

But a short time after, too, Cormac, the boy of the Great Mountain" was found dead on the floor of his cabin. He seemed to have died in some dreadful agony, and the terrified people who found him, entertained fear that mountain road more than ever, and swore that no act of evil, on the part of Cormac, the miser, still haunts the spot. It appeared to be a fearful agony for the fishing, and a sore presage of destruction for the lower, or other disasters.

The Cardinal and the Infidel.

Years ago, while Cardinal McCloskey was yet a parish priest, an incident that happened which was not without its influence on the career of another man. An infidel was holding forth with much earnestness at a little social assemblage one evening when the young priest was called in to his aid and applaud. Pious, modest, an assuming rather than McCloskey was not yet distinguished few people had heard of him outside of certain circles of intimates in the church. The host was an old friend with whom he had been a schoolfellow when he was a lad, and he was glad to see that it was evident that the priest was finding much more pleasure in revisiting old time reminiscences than in attending to the attractions of the conversation of the free-thinking orator about whom the greater part of the evening had been spent.

Finally, however, further audience was demanded. He found himself addressed directly by name. He offered an evasive answer, and sought to turn the conversation into pleasanter channels, but the aggrieved orator would not hear of it. He was called upon to defend the ignorance of the priest. He broke almost into a rage at the suggestion that his deliverance, but vehemence really in their place, for the reality to come. But he managed to make a fair retreat, and he did not, and the old man, blessing Lonnie from the door with a look of bitter hatred. "In the good days I was author but calling me ignorance, and swearing I should be driven out of the place after I was many months older, and then it was bigger o' me, and getting my money, and what have I to regret? Sure, I'm a bit of a place, where I have lived so long."

The stranger was already in the inner room, and Denis, his faithful Denis, "he asked at last, "is this what you have seen to, and I never knew it?"

"Mr. Charlie, he cried out, "I had never dared ask you for it. It is my poor mother's prayers, and to think I could have doubted the good Lord! Sure, I'm a bad man, I'm that bad, the pains of death may come on me this minute!"

FISH CULTURE FOR FARMERS.

Some Practical Hints that may be Profitable to California Farmers.

Editor of the Monitor.

Dear Sir—I have for a long time thought it a pity a paper for the Paper of Fish Culture, but not being used to writing pot I still put it off. But now I see you are with publishing done, and you will oblige a reader. Respectfully, [illegible] Pittsburgh, Pa.

[illegible] Pittsburgh, Pa.

[illegible] to my left a human all over the country, and I am sorry to say, that I am not at all anxious to call an honest living. When I was only 25 and about 40 years old, we have to look sharp to make ends meet, and a few cofferings of thought gives them much to assist us. I have that I have all that I possess to thing yourself in my different papers. I bought a farm in Iowa. Then everyone thought that things were at their lowest and times most lightsome. But experience good times did not make my exchequer. I could see raw grain, cattle or hogs with any profit. So I was driven to look for something new. I arrive on raising Fish. I will say to start in that the U. S. Government will give free of charge to anyone desiring to start in the business four 12 to 20 "German Carp Pair" to ship to any place in the United States, the power to advance "Fish Culture" as it is a business field of great and increasing importance. It requires to spread and brings in a large revenue, and there is a ready cash market for the Fish. There is no possible doubt but that it will more nearly pay to Fish Culture than in raising cattle, sheep, or hogs. Its strength of are not detected. The Fish are very Fish and are of the finest kind. I have a stock of carp farmers say, as I said I would like to know.

Where can I get the Carp? Answer—Write to the U. S. Fish Cul. Commissioner, it will cost you a little money, but perhaps you will get free the information you desire. Will be very kind of you if you will write to 20 German Carp, which the Government will give free of charge. Is it not a good business? Answer—Yes, they will pay well, and by which you can get the Fish cultured. I have no doubt of my making money in the Fish business. I have a pond 1 acre in size, the Government would go to the expense of raising Fish as I propose, hoping that it will be a profitable trade for those others to engage in. I have a large pond must I have, and what will it cost to start with—Answer A pond five or 20 feet across will do for a start, and it will cost nothing except a little digging. You can easily pay out a cost. Fish are raising on my lot. What will I do for water? The Government Carp do require running water. They do better in still water, even swamps are good. Will they not be in danger from U. S. as the best and most profitable for raising fish? Any place in the U. S. will do, Fish are the same. Can I get a ready sale for your fish. Kansas is above all, but alone your goodness to her as much. The "Herman Carp" are such excellent fish that they command a good price everywhere. Will it not take a long time to raise Fish in quantity? Answer—No, the Government gives? Answer—No, indeed each female Carp from 40 to 60 thousand eggs every year. Is not the business amazingly fast, and will increase your fortune in just as fast as the Fish can increase? Is it not a fish pond? Answer—Yes, I have a pond 1 acre in size between Nov 1st, and March 1st. Do you think I can make a living out of it? Answer—Yes, I think you can, if you are not nothing during the cold months, but be on a distant state while sheep and cattle are eating their heads off. If the Government gives free of charge 20 Carp, the fishing egg, full of a peace that no trouble had ever observed.

But a short time after, too, Cormac, the boy of the Great Mountain" was found dead on the floor of his cabin. He seemed to have died in some dreadful agony, and the terrified people who found him, entertained fear that mountain road more than ever, and swore that no act of evil, on the part of Cormac, the miser, still haunts the spot. THE SEVEN SHRINES OF MARY.

BY CYRIL CLARE.

"Twelve months ago I was a poor man. My own wife and a few relations were carrying on a little business in a little village in Ireland. I was a poor man. Any one can tell you that. Honored sir, they can tell you the way to Corsica is but one step from the black place and a wretched hut. It is a place for the reality to come. But I am proud to be an Irishman, and I am not ashamed of my poverty I'm in, and me, and my wife and children, asking charity to eat a bit of bread.

"I came here to find Denis Mahoney," interrupted the stranger brusquely. "Have you much poverty to tell me?"

"Is there, the swindling thief of the world, and the old sick, Lazarus Lonnie from the door with a look of bitter hatred. "In the good days I was author but calling me ignorance, and swearing I should be driven out of the place after I was many months older, and then it was bigger o' me, and getting my money, and what have I to regret? The Chant of the Souls in Purgatory.

The following appeared in the writings of the Venerable Th. Hoeven, Dutch Author, and what he translates from the Dutch into French, as seen translated into English.

It is the "black month" (November) the month of the souls in purgatory, the month of the dead and praying for them. On the evening of All Souls Day the cemetery is invaded by the multitude. Each knee bent, crowded on the damp grass, by the graves of their dear relatives, and all the holiest, their gravestone with holy water or, second the collections, sometimes in tears in the church. The hour was an old friend with whom he had been a schoolfellow when he was a lad, and he was glad to see that it was evident that the priest was finding much more pleasure in revisiting old time reminiscences than in attending to the attractions of the conversation of the free-thinking orator about whom the greater part of the evening had been spent.

The MONITOR has the largest circulation of any Religious Paper published on the Pacific Coast.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1885.

THE ILLUSTRATED CHRISTMAS MONITOR.

In accordance with our annual custom we will present our readers with a twelve page illustrated MONITOR at CHRISTMAS, and we desire to inform all persons and religious orders, though that their contributions must reach this office on or before the 20th of November, in order to get copied in time for the CHRISTMAS MONITOR will have to go to press on December 15th, so as to reach all sections of the Union by Christmas Day. Persons who desire extra copies to send to friends can have them mailed free, direct from this office, by sending in at any time between now and Christmas the addresses of those to whom they wish copies sent, accompanied with 10 cents in one or stamps for each copy thus ordered for friends in the Eastern States or Europe. The CHRISTMAS MONITOR will be a most acceptable present to send to friends far away from those who dwell along the Pacific Coast, and we hope that hundreds of our subscribers will avail themselves of this liberal offer.

Editorial Notes.

—A very interesting contribution on Fish Culture will be found on the second page of this issue of THE MONITOR. The suggestions therein may prove very profitable to many of our readers all over this coast if they are carried out as our correspondent suggests.

—Dr. O'Connell, Rector of the American College in Rome, arrived in New York last Monday, bringing with him the acts and decrees of the Third Plenary Council held in Baltimore, which have been revised by the Pope. The decrees are substantially unaltered, but some minor details have been modified. Dr. O'Connell expects to return to Rome early in January.

—There seems to be a general determination among the people all over this coast that the Chinese must go. Already they have been forcibly expelled from several towns in Washington territory and Oregon as well as from towns in this State. Self preservation is the first law of nature, and the laboring portion of the white race will not suffer their right to life, liberty and happiness to be destroyed by the interference of Chinese coolies.

—Great Britain's agricultural interests are doomed to be destroyed by American competition. A wail comes from Lincolnshire, England, because the people are breaking up there to the most lively fashion. The country produces nothing but wheat, and, of course, with that commodity at 30s. and 29s. 6d. a quarter, the growers are bankrupted. A Cambridge graduate lost £75,000 at farming in three or four seasons, and is now clerk to a local gas company. The farming population are all clubbing to get to this country, as American competition has killed their occupation.

—Scarcely a day passes but some claring Catholics, some over by cable from Europe and is spread broadcast over America to the detriment of Christian morality. In a subpigram of the 6th inst.—concerning the Canadian rebel Riel—it was stated that for the part Riel played in the rebellion of 1869, the Pope sent him, as a memento, "a nail from Christ's cross." This is another of those malignant falsehoods with which the Atlantic cable is so frequently "dot, as we must in the present was ever made by the Pope to Riel.

—Lord Carnarvon promises to be the most liberal Lord Lieutenant representing England in Ireland for many years. His latest act of justice towards the Catholics of Ireland is an intimation which he sent to the Archbishop of Tuam that he has been successful in obtaining consent to establish a Boys' Industrial School at Letterfrack, and to procure the extension of the Girls' Industrial Schools at Clifden and Westport. As a further proof of his practical concern for the education of the poor, his Excellency has succeeded with those concerned in securing leases for schools and teachers' dwellings on the Islands of Aran.

—The advice given to the Catholics of Socovia, Prussia, concerning their duty as voters, is just as applicable to the Catholics of the Pacific coast as it is to our co-religionists who are more directly interested in the Prussian Reichstrath. The Bishop says: "These elections are important for all; both as regards this present life, for the laws that may be passed will last for ages; and as regards eternity, for those same laws, in their relation to Church and schools, will influence the eternal salvation of many. It is a duty, therefore, for all to be united, and to work might and main for our common spiritual interests." Would that the Catholics of America might emblazon these words on their political battle flags whenever the interests of the Church or Catholic education is concerned.

—We stated a few weeks ago our belief that Cardinal Newman was misquoted when the secular press made him say that the English Established church was "the great Indower against infidelity" on that land. In this the MONITOR was correct, as Cardinal Newman, in a letter recently published in a London paper, says over his own signature: "I beg leave to call your attention to a passage in your admirable review book of Dr. Pusey's work. It is there asserted by implication that the 'statement that the Church of England is, in fact, the great bulwark against infidelity in this land,' was 'originally enunciated by Dr. Newman.' I have written in my lifetime a great deal more than I can remember, but I neither know where I have made this particular statement nor can I conceive I ever made it, whether in print, in private letter or in conversation. And I am sure I should not have made it deliberately. Certainly it does not express my real judgment concerning the Church of England. Nor have I any reason to think that Dr. Pusey ascribes it to me. What I said in my 'Apologia' was this: 'Hitherto the National Church has hitherto been a serviceable breakwater against doctrinal error, more fundamental than is usual. The words 'serviceable' and 'breakwater' both convey the idea of something accidental and defective, whereas a bulwark is an essential part of the thing defended. Moreover, in saying 'against doctrinal error,' I meant more fundamental than this or that doctrinal error and those fundamental.'

It is enough for me, since a new Ecclesiastical will shortly be issued by the Holy Father. The document is said to be entitled "Sinn Sacrestumnt," the meaning of which is divided into two parts, the first part is doctrinal, and denounces the rights of the Church in all existing governments, and sets forth the Pope's views on the relations of the Church and States. The second part draws a harrowing picture of modern society, which is suffering for having abandoned the principles of the Catholic Church, and falls consequently to provide for or to relieve the aching classes. Society, impoverished and deceived, have lost all respect for civil and religious authority, and now seem on the verge of overturning the entire social fabric of Europe in revolution and anarchy. As soon as the documents reaches this office we will furnish our readers with the full text of the important document.

The Forty Hours' Devotion.

Archbishop Riordan having established the Forty Hours' Devotion throughout his Diocese, it is proper that we should give a brief explanation of that devotion for the benefit of thousands of our young readers or those Catholics who have never participated in the performance of this salutary spiritual exercise.

The Forty Hours' Devotion dates from the sixteenth century, when Fr. Joseph, a Capuchin of Milan, arranged the forty hours exposition of the Blessed Sacrament in honor of the forty hours our Divine Redeemer spent in the tomb. In 1560 Pope Pius IV., gave his apostolic sanction to a society called the Confraternity of Prayer or of Death, the main object of the members of which was to assist at the Forty Hours' Devotion every month.

In 1592 Pope Clement VIII. instituted the public and perpetual adoration of the Blessed Sacrament on the different altars of all the principal churches in Rome. The Forty Hours were begun in St. Peter's and Force continued at regular intervals in all the churches during the whole year.

This is precisely what Archbishop Riordan is about accomplishing in this Diocese with the participation of the Rev. Clergy and the faithful laity who desire to secure for their souls the graces which Almighty God showers down upon all who honor Him in the Blessed Sacrament.

In order to excite additional devotion in all Catholic hearts, the Vicar of Christ has generously granted—to all the faithful of either sex—an indulgence of seven years, and as many quarantines, to be gained each day that they visit the church where the Blessed Sacrament is exposed, and spend some time in prayer. Also a plenary indulgence to all who, besides visiting the church where the Blessed Sacrament is exposed, and praying there on one day, go to Confession and receive Holy Communion in the Church where the Blessed Sacrament is exposed.

The Forty Hours' Devotion will be commenced on the First Sunday of Advent in St. Mary's Cathedral in this city and in St. Rafael's Church, San Rafael, on the Second Sunday in Advent the Devotion will be instituted in the Church of the Immaculate Conception, Oakland, and in the Church Nuestra Senora del Pilar, Spanishtown. On the Third Sunday in Advent the exercises will begin in St. Joseph's Church, Alameda, and in St. Rose's at Santa Rosa. On the Fourth Sunday in Advent the devotions will be commenced in the Presentation Convent chapel, Taylor and Ellis streets, and in St. Francis School's Church, Sonoma. The names of the other churches where the devotions will be carried on during the remainder of the ecclesiastical year will be printed in our editorial pages to the Christmas festival.

PIUS IX., POPE.

"FOR A PERPETUAL MEMORY OF THE THING."

The illustrious Order of Friar Preachers has been established even in France, by hereditary right the privilege of propagating the pious exercise of the Rosary in honor of the Blessed Virgin Mary and of so-called substantiation of the Rosary, and this right has been confirmed many times by the Roman Pontiffs. Therefore the pious, also of the three provinces in France earnestly long that their Order may be put in possession of all its rights in this matter.

By the piety and industry of Marie Jaribert, of pious memory, a society was instituted at Lyons under the name of the Living Rosary, the members of which, distributed into groups of fifteen, draw by lots every month one of the Mysteries of the Rosary on which they meditate every day of the month while they recite a decade of the Rosary, this being repeated every month. Two forty, which already embraces a considerable number of members, was approved and enriched with indulgences by our predecessor Gregory XVI., of happy memory, who gave it as "Protector" the most eminent Cardinal Alexander Lambruschini, the Apostolic Nuncio of France, and as "Chief Director" our beloved son Selvagna, Canon of the Metropolitan Church of Lyons, giving the power to substitute lay directors in the different dioceses, as I is special to our beloved son the second the various sections of the society.

At the present time both the "Protector" and the "Chief Director" have appointed as long since dead, and the tie by of Friar Preachers has been established in France, since it is now divided into three provinces. Therefore, our dear sons, the present superior of these three provinces, seeing that the Living Rosary is designed by its original constitution and grants to the Order of Preachers the right of living the indulgences granted to it, assuredly feel that we will, by our authority, confirm the supreme dignity of Living Rosary to the Holy Order of Friar Preachers, and that the government of the society in the Brotherhoods of the Confraternity of the Holy Rosary erected in various places.

Desiring to fulfill their desires, and to grant special marks of our good will to those who are favored in these letters, we also for them, for this purpose only, and we declare that the Order of Friar Preachers, in the Kingdom of France, is to be considered as the Chief Director of the Living Rosary, in substitution of the Apostolic Prayer, are hereby to be substituted for the Confraternity of the Rosary, and to have the same rights and indulgences which are given to the Confraternity of the Rosary, and to have the same rights and indulgences which are given to the Confraternity of the Rosary, and to have the same rights and indulgences which are given to

Farm and Home.

Useful Hints when Help is Needed.

— When a sprain occurs, lose no time in attending to it, however trivial it may at first appear. If at the ankle, sit down and remove the shoes and socks at once. As certain from the comparison of feet whether there has been a fracture or dislocation. If so, send for a physician as soon as possible, and keep perfectly quiet until he comes. If there is no fracture or displacement of the bones but only an excessive aching about the joint, send for a pail of hot water. Bathe the foot in this for fifteen to thirty minutes, keeping the water as hot as the ankle bone, and applying it with a sponge or towel. Then wrap the foot with strips of flannel saturated with hot water, and cover this dry with cloths. It is better not to touch the injured foot to the ground. Every step taken after a bad sprain adds a day to prevent its permanent recovery. Complete rest is the best cure for a sprain.

— Water can not satisfy the thirst which attends cholera, dysentery, diarrhea and some other forms of disease; in fact, drinking cold water seems to increase the thirst and induce other disagreeable sensations; but this thirst will be perfectly and pleasantly subdued by eating a comparatively small amount of ice, swallowing it as a large pieces as practicable, and as much as is wanted.

— The teeth should be washed with a stiff brush on rising, and with an old, used brush immediately after each meal, always employing lukewarm water or boiling cold water in the back part of the mouth until it is warmed. Never eat an atom after the teeth have been washed for the night. Always use the brush slowly, lightly and long; teeth may be ruined or broken. After using let the bristles of the brush be moved up and down by a twisting motion, making each one a tooth-pick. A yellowish tint to a tooth is proof of its soundness; hence do not seek to keep them of a pearly whiteness. It decays them.

— In case of bleeding from the nose, hold a sponge saturated with cold water to the nostrils, or, if this does not succeed, dissolve a little alum in a basin of water and inject or sniff some of this up the nostrils. Hold the head back and do not attempt to blow the nose.

— The best materials for poultices for common use are flaxseed, bread, charcoal, yeast, etc. A poultice should be applied to the inflamed part as warm as it can be comfortably borne. If the surface should be very tender, however, care should be taken to reduce the temperature of the poultice and to apply it gently one part at a time. After the poultice is applied the heat and moisture should be maintained as long as possible. A flaxseed poultice is strongly recommended when a soothing influence is desired, and heat and moisture are the great requirements. A bread poultice is perhaps more easily made, though not quite so effective. Yeast poultice is often used where the parts are slow to heal and it seems desirable to stimulate them. Charcoal poultices are thought by some physicians to have a disinfecting power, and are sometimes used on old wounds and indolent ulcers.

An Irish Mountain Farm.

Henry Labouchere in his paper, London Truth, says:—I wonder how many Englishmen have any notion what a Connaught mountain "farm" is like. Well, if you were to take off here and there about a third of the pavement behind the Duke of York's monument and plant "crops" in the holes thus made, and then between the cracks of the remaining stones insert a good many ferns and weeds, and set the place thoroughly, and lift the whole surface to an angle of about forty-five degrees, and then throw down the monument upon it in goodish big pieces, you will have an Irish mountain farm in miniature. But, for my part, I should not fancy paying rent for such a place. My argument would be that after all the trouble I had taken in grubbing up the stones and planting the crops and throwing down the monument I had earned the rights to be wet to the skin six days out of seven rent free. This is exactly what the "cultivators of the rock on the west coasts of Ireland, Scotland and the adjacent isles do say; and as they have now got votes, their opinions will probably attract some little attention in the near future.

Give a Paper to your Children

A child beginning to read becomes delighted with a newspaper, because he reads of names and things which are familiar, and he will progress accordingly. A newspaper in one year will do a child more good than a quarter of a year's schooling. Everything it must consider that information is connected with advertising. The mother of the family being one of its heads and having a more immediate charge of the children, should herself be instructed. A need occupied becomes fortified against the ills of this life, and is broad for emergency. Children amused by reading or study are, of course, more considerate and easily governed. How many thoughtless young men have spent their earnings in a tavern or grog shop who ought to have been reading! How many parents who have not spent twenty dollars for books for their families would have given thousands to reclaim a son or daughter who had ignorantly thoughtlessly, fallen into temptation.

Danger in Oysters.

Now that the oyster season is fairly opened it is in order for us to advise however when they should order their oysters opened, for while there may not appear to be any danger in so innocent a looking thing as an oyster, there is nevertheless great danger in its killing us if by chance we should swallow a ragged piece of the oyster shell when eating oysters. There is just one way to prevent this danger, and that is by refusing all oysters that have been opened by the process known as "smashing." This operation spoils the appearance of the oyster and its shell, and small particles of the shell are hammered into the oyster, which, when introduced into the stomach, become a terror as deadly as the mistaken of drugists. Insist on it that your oysters are opened by the stabbing process, and you avert this danger. Children should not be allowed to eat oysters—raw or cooked—unless they have been thoroughly and carefully examined for minute particles of shells. I am very serious about this oyster-opening business, for having lost a very dear friend through his having carelessly swallowed a piece of oyster shell which clung to the oyster. I feel that I can not be too emphatic on this subject.—The Cook.

Family Fun.

Running for Office.

Hogg was as peaceable a man as everlived. He was sober, honest and respected. He had never beaten his wife; never taken any interest in a dog fight; had never been known to jump anybody else's watch, and never had attempted to steal a saw mill. Hogg's character was above reproach. He was a shining light to society. All his fellow citizens looked up to and honored him. He was extremely popular among the ladies. He was a church member and a deacon, and for several years had been a member of the committee for School Director—without salary.

Alas! Poor Hogg!

Little did he understand the deceit and treachery of this wicked world. His eyes were soon opened, however, for in less than a week after he was nominated, the opposition had fully established the following damaging charges against him:

1—That he was a free liver.

2—That he was a secret emissary of the Pope of Rome.

3—That he had broken his mother-in-law's jaw with an ice-pick.

4—That, if elected, he would make love to every school "marm" in the Department.

He Remembered.

"And you pretend to say," remarked a lawyer to a witness, "that you remember the exact words this man said to you ten years ago?"

"I do."

"Well, if my memory serves me, I met about this to know if you can swear to any expression which I then made?"

"I can."

"Yes, Mr. J., I want you to remember that you are under oath. Now, do you swear that you can quote with great accuracy a remark I made to you at Saratoga, five years ago?"

"I can."

"Well, what was it?"

"You met me in the hotel corridor."

"Yes, quite correct.

"And you shook hands with me."

"Naturally I did."

"And you said to me: 'Let's go and take something.'"

The otter of the court had to call silence for ten minutes, and the lawyer endeavored that the witness had a remarkable memory.

Hard to Suit.

"Mother," said a young wife, "would you mind cooking the dinner to-day? It would please John, I know. He complains somuch of the new girl that I shall be happier the moment I can get another.

"Certainly," replied the old lady cordially.

At dinner John said to his wife:

"Mary that new girl seems to be getting worse and worse."

The Broken Needle.

"Some twenty years ago," said the mild faced stranger, "my wife, while sewing suddenly missed her needle. She sat rocking more of it, and soon forgot all about her loss until last week, when—"

"When she found it, and was forgiven all about her rocking?" suggested Doodle. "When the point of the needle showed itself between her shoulder blades," growled Coffin. "When the needle was seen protruding from her prominent daughter's left forefinger," intimated Doodle. "No and the old faced stranger, "you are all wrong. She found it in a crack in the floor. It had been there all those years. Singular wasn't it? There was a common desire to walk with the blood of the mild faced stranger; but each demurred, and Coffin and Doodle paid their shamefaces.

A Misjudged Woman.

There were a half a dozen of them holding down a many chairs in a suburban drug store the other evening, when the talk changed to tramps, thieves and burglars, and Smith said:

"Well, now, but I'd like to try an experiment. I am a little skittish about them desperados, and Mrs. Smith knows it and takes advantage to brag about her own courage. She says she'd just like to find a tramp on the premises, and I'd see how she colored him up."

"Will!" asked one.

"Well, suppose one of you rig up and go to the front door and demand something to eat, and be mighty impudent about it; it will give her a scare and stop her brags."

The crowd fell in with the idea and one of the men donned an old hat and coat and fixed up as a tramp. Two minutes later he was knocking at the side door, while Smith and his friends were posted across the street.

It wasn't over two minutes after the tramp's first knock before he came out of the yard. He came over the fence. He was in such a hurry that he ran thirty rods before he could bring up. When Smith and the others reached him he had his hat off and was feeling his head and getting his breath to keep back a groan.

"Well," said Smith "what did you do?"

"Told her I wanted a hot supper mighty quick."

"And what did she say?"

"She asked whether I would have boiled turkey or frizzaeated chicken, and while I was trying to make up my mind she looked me on the ship, struck me on the head with a club and pushed me off the steps all in the same time.

And every one of the group looked back and saw Mrs. Smith on the walk in front of the house apparently waiting for somebody's return, and each man gasped out

"Will, I'll be hanged."

A Trade Revelation.

Mrs. De Blank—"Oh! Henry, you must send for the doctor at once. I believe I am getting the dropsy. Now don't delay a moment."

Mr. De Blank—"Why, what put that idea into your head?"

"Dear me! will you never be satisfied? Do what I say is true! I got weighed to-day and oh, it's awful! I weighed 300 pounds."

"Great St. George! where did you get weighed?"

"Around at your oval yard."

"Calm yourself, my dear. Your weight is exactly 150 pounds."

Cigars at Wholesale

Customer (in Harrison cigar store)—Have you got any Havana Cigars?

Dealer—Ya, dat vas a great Havana, varranted.

Customer—Give me a dollar's worth.

Dealer—Vas!

Customer—A dollar's worth.

Dealer—(confidentially)—You pay a counterfaar more and take a box.

All "Played Out."

"Isn't know what ails me lately. Can't eat well—cant sleep well. Can't work, and don't feel like anything. I am really played out, and really don't well. Dad of played out, nobody. That is what more of men are every day. If they would take the 'Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery' they would soon have no occasion to say it. It purifies the blood, tones up the system and revitalizes it against disease. It is a great anti-bilious remedy as well.

ST. JOHN'S

NEWS OF THE WORLD.

CABLEGRAMS FROM ALL COUNTRIES.

Tyndall Denounces Gladstone.

LONDON, Nov. 4.—John Tyndall, scientist, has written a letter in which he declines to stand as a candidate for member of Parliament for Greenwich. He says that the prominent aims of the Home would not suit him. He denounces Gladstone's policy as a dangerous one, and he doesn't like Parnell, however, or what they had anything in view, but he would willingly accept re-election as his chair. He proceeds to denounce the Gladstone Cabinet, which, he says, needed to be completely rent, caused five years of humiliation abroad and confusion at home. Recalling the events in the Transvaal and the Soudan, Mr. Tyndall says: "If there be a day of retribution for the accidents of men, I would not willingly accompany to the judgment seat the unpatriotic spirits of those who are responsible for the bloodshed in Egypt, and who have left behind us a dangerous business from the beginning to the end, yet the man who is responsible, above all others, for waste of blood, who sent Gordon to the wilds and there abandoned him to death and mutilation, was dare talk to the people of Mid Lothian, as if no fault rested upon his workmanship. The Conservative are fairly doing Tyndall's letter broadcast.

The Elections in Prussia.

BERLIN, Nov. 4.—As a result of the elections for members of the Prussian Diet, the strength of the parties in the Lower House is as follows: Conservatives, 140; Free Conservatives, 60; Clericals, 99; National Liberals, 70; New Germans, Liberals, 41; Poles, 14; Danes, 2; Guelphs, 11; Socialists, 1; Independents, 2. Ballots will be held on the 20th, 21st, 22nd, 23rd, 24th, 25th, 26th, 27th, 28th, 29th, 30th, 31st, 32nd, 33rd, 34th, 35th, 36th, 37th, 38th, 39th, 40th, 41st, 42nd, 43rd, 44th, 45th, 46th, 47th, THE MOUNTAIN STREAMS OF IRELAND.

BY DUBOIT.

The mountain streams of Ireland,
How steadily rolling,
They dash and leap down, they
Rush and they roar down!
Yet where the exile is his own
Where he was born to be his dreams
The stream be brief, long, long ago
The rushing, mountain streams!

Methinks the ancient bards, if land
Could hear the music
Of these mountain streams, rushing springs
Be wonder struck throughout
Forgot the ancient harp, and
Of the olden bardic theme
That hoard the exile's memory sprg.
Ye rapturous, mountain streams!

They wall a fragrant odor down
From ev'ry grass vale
And sadly to the breeze tell
The black historic tale
Of Gladis, Cromwell and Cromwell
And all the bloody tyrannous
To how the desolation trick rave
The bright eternal stream!

Monastic pile and holy wall,
Romantic glen and glade
Thou sacred scene of fairies youth
Thou ever by memories
Like some bewitching fairy spell
They haunt our waking dreams
Where'er we stray, far, far away
From Ireland's beauty stream!

Twas on the rippling Maida's banks
Fame "foreign Synnyr" sang
His Fiorra Gaoes, our Ireland's muse
From Infancy had nursed!
And Davis sit by Avondale,
Dreaming in sweet dreams,
Had Cadmus bright as morning light
In Ireland's sacrifice patriotism.

Give me back the land of legends,
Of wizard lay and lore,
Where the Phoenix fought for Conar
In the epic days of yore,
Where the spoon of mighty Brian
Outshone the morning beams
And wept the Dane from Clontarf's plains
And Ireland's wrongs avenge.

Give me back that land of mem'ries,
Where ancient Tara's towers,
Are with its wildest ruins, are
The records of the Gaels
Nor time nor wreck nor's or suppress,
Nor outlaws tyrant's schemes,
One ray of love her children bear
The lovely land of streams.

OUR BELOVED DEAD.

Our Loved once die;
Sweet flowers we strew,
And bitter tears we shed,
Above the silent, sacred graves,
Where sleep our hallowed dead.

And Time rolls on;
Our loved ones
It sometimes our sorrows cease
And often, o'er the flowers are dead
Their memory is no more.

We say of them,
The good they've done,
The bright examples given,
The weary, heavy crosse they've borne
Have surely won them Heaven.

They need from us,
No heart-felt prayer,
No plaintive, fervent sighs,
That God may open wide the gates
And take His suffering saints home.

For God is just,
And He has said
"Ye shall shall enter there;"
But, His mercy formed a place,
Where souls are made more fair.

Literary Miscellany.

A Measureless Ill.

BY MAURICE J. DOAN.

"For years a nonentoun!
For years, forever to year!"
—Tom poet.

Old John Romell and I were standing on the bridge. Behind us the Saturnine was lovely, though it was a January afternoon; the air had all the softness of early spring. Below us, yet distinctly, over the silent hills and water came the sharp ring of that anthem of sad joy, "Ah de le morte." It is a hackneyed song, and heavy-browed singers have torn its passion to tatters, and the heavy-shouldered band at the fort had often practiced on it as they did now, and yet, sounding on this bright glimpse of spring in wintry weather, it seemed like a wail for all the service in the world.

I listened until old John spoke: "And you never heard of the Berryls! I thought you everybody knew the Berryls for miles around. They do say that the first Tom Berryl was a awful Tory in the Revolutionary time, and that he called George Washington "a disloyal viper" one day; but then he was an Englishman, and I don't blame him for sticking to his country, right or wrong. Y-e don't, I'm that! Well, young folks have their ideas and old folks have theirs, but in my time young folks used to follow the ideas of their elders, and it seems to me they got along well enough.

Old Jean Berryl died, and left one son, the second Jean. Young Jim Berryl, his son, was one of Mosby's men in the war, and Jean, who lifted him costs better than gray, swore that he was no true Berryl, and he never came home. But it's not Arthur, the elder, that I wet to talk.

Arthur was a fine fellow—one of your tall, broad-shouldered, deep-chested chaps—a real Southerner; you Yanks have nothing like it—with sharp gray eyes that could see through a bale of cotton, and a forest of brown hair on his face; yes, a regular forest, more fit for a savage than a Christian—not that Arthur Berryl was much of a Christian; but never mind that just now.

He went into the Navy's army in 61, and came out three years later a colonel, still on right hand. A cannon-ball had shattered it. This one of the Berryls hadn't much use for his right hand in the way of work. He had a house over there in Virginia, and some money that his mother had left him; and, besides, everybody knows that old Eaau is a mighty rich man. And the old fellow was evidently set, with pride about his son "the Colonel." Didn't blame him, though it was always a "Bah"—every time he came, and "Ah!"—every time he left, though it made me sad when I thought of my own poor boy, who fought might and main with McClusky, and then came home to his poor old dad with not so much as a stripe on his sleeve, but we had neither money nor rank to throw away.

Ah, you don't see that up No't's this time of year. Yalies jessamine, I swear!

(My old friend rested both hands on his knotty stick, and seemed to gaze at a negro who was passing. The negro's arms were full of bright yellow blossoms, though the sun was not yet warm enough to break the ice on the Potomac.)

Yes, the jessamine reminds me of that day, for there was some of it growing near Glasgow. I don't know much of education, but I have feelings, and education can't give a man feelings, can it? and that jessamine makes me feel downhearted.

And as Arthur Berryl had nothing to do, for a man with no right hand can do precious little, he went the way of all young men, and fell in love.

She was pretty, I tell you. Her big, Julian—I mean, he was some deep for you. I took him—was courting her mother's Sue, and so was Jean and the Colonel.

Her name was Annie Desmond. Her mother was a widow with some little property. They lived over there, not far from the canal.

It was just after we were converted, my wife and I. Poor Bob, my son, would have died in prison, if it hadn't for the Sisters of Charity. Heaven bless em! had not taken his mother's place, and so when he came home, he made his mother and me believe there must be something in a religion that could turn out such women. We weren't much on religion; she was a hard-shell Baptist when she was young; I was a sort of Episcopalian, and when Bob grew up he just believed in Bowery.

Well, one fine day we threw knift at the—the—in Trinity Church, and we've thanked God ever since.

And so that was the way we first saw Annie Desmond. She was at Mass every Sunday. Pretty was no word for her. She wasn't tall, and she wasn't short; but when she walked up the aisle, you felt that there was a lady coming, her step was so light and firm. I'm no hand at describing look, I only know that her face was bright and sweet, and it was gay sometimes, and never; and I saw it in despair.

Her cheeks were prettier than the color of my pink cousins, and her eyes were dark, and blue, and clear. One day, when her hat blew off on the church steps, her hair seemed a regular shower of brown and gold threads. I never spoke to her, neither did my wife; but if she had been our own daughter we couldn't have taken more interest in her.

Colonel Berryl was passing along the street that day when her hat blew away. He caught it in his hand, and gave it to her with a low bow. I saw there eyes meet. That's sort of lyrum. You young folks don't read him or Moore nowadays. Perhaps it's best.

The day old Eaau actually laughed. A little grandson was coming into the world. He was a pretty baby, Sue said, like his mother, but he was quiet and still, and he never cried at all. The old fellow in him seemed to be in his pretty bloss eyes.

Mrs. Desmond wanted to have his baptised at once.

This made old Eaau sweat. He wouldn't hear of it.

Arthur sided with his father.

Mrs. Desmond looked at the child again. She entreated Arthur to send for a priest.

"Never shall a priest enter these doors, ma am" roared old Eaau.

Mrs. Desmond appealed to Arthur. He said, "My father and you must settle this."

She remembered him of his promise. He only smiled. She was a hot-tempered woman, and she had to begin hard still swage. Then she left the house.

Days counted into three weeks. The child still lived, and moved a little, and cried a little. Sue said he wouldn't live a day, but he's a tough baby.

Every day Mrs. Desmond visited her daughter. Every day she pleaded about the child's baptism was renewed. Old Eaau stood off; and, in the end, Arthur was too much afraid of his father to yield to the pleadings of his poor wife.

Poor girl! Black Sue said it made her cry to see her young mistress's white, anxious face.

Mrs. Desmond made her usual visit, and looked at the baby. Sue said that Annie was lying back in an arm-chair, but she looked pale and spoke of wanting her mother as if her life depended on it. Eaau dropped his newspaper and followed her.

She saw something in her mother's face that frightened her.

Mrs. Desmond stood near the toilet-table with the child in her arms. Sue was in the doorway. She had left a pitcher of water on the table, and was going out, when Annie's voice, like a moan of the wind, made her turn:

"Mother!"

They called the baby by no name yet.

The young wife knelt at her husband's feet, and looked up to him:

"Have mercy, Arthur," she said.

Her face turned as white as a dead woman's at the lock in his face. She fell back with a dull thud.

Eaau, Arthur and Sue went to her instantly.

Mrs Desmond stood alone with the child near the toilet-table. The others had their backs to her. Whether she baptized the child or not, or whether it was already dead when she took it in her arms, she never told.

When Annie recovered her senses, the baby lay cold and still—dead.

The funeral was a grand one for such a little thing. It was a cold, damp day, but my wife and I went with the rest over to Mount Calvary Cemetery, where the Berryls have a family vault.

Annie stood near the grave. I could not see her face through her thick black veil, but I could hear her sob.

Mrs. Desmond stood next to her, stern as a saxon. On the other side was Arthur, as stern, but seemingly like a man in pain. Since when? I thought.

They waited at the grave until nearly everybody had gone. My wife and I drew off a distance and waited too. Woman are so curious.

"Come!" said Mrs. Desmond, sharply, and she took her daughter's arm.

Annie raised her veil. Her face seemed as the sight of it. Annie gave her hand to Arthur. It took it in his.

"Good-bye" she whispered.

"Good-bye" he said, turning away.

* * * * * * * *

Ah, what pity it is that people don't tell anything if it wasn't for their families, but these Desmonds, though they hadn't any family in particular, Mrs. Desmond, I'm true, did let out something about being descended from the kings of Ireland; but when that dress was worn for much good it's not like being descended from a Washington, a Carroll, a Lee, and when I mention these names, I think of a Russell, for we are an old family, I assure you, though we have worked hard in our time.

Mrs. Desmond was mighty glad to have Arthur Berryl come to her house; folks said. Annie liked him from the first; but I think her mother must have favored him, and made courtship easy for the young people.

Eaau objected to Annie. There were plenty of girls around the Dozens of Virginia—girls of good family and all manner of creeds. He didn't see why a Beryl should marry a Catholic.

Arthur said: "Don't you mind her wishes, Sue? Have tried it; it isn't for any only a girl, and after a while she'll believe you are right and wrong, and I'll do anything to please her now; and, by and by, she'll do anything to please me."

Eaau didn't keep up his opposition long; he believed that Arthur had the wisest head in the family.

Eaau did not believe much. He was of the school of Jefferson and Tom Paine, and son swore by Hunley and Tyndall. The old man held that there was a Supreme Being; the young man was not certain whether he believed there was or not.

Old Eaau disliked all forms of Christianity, but, quite naturally, he hated Catholics more than all.

He said to Arthur: "If this girl becomes your wife you may be sure she will practice reunion if you choose; but if there are any children, and you let a priest come near them, or have any superstitious mummery over them, I'll leave every cent I own, and every acre of land, to Jim. So help me God I will!"

Colonel Berryl was passing along the street that day when her hat blew away. He caught it in his hand, and gave it to her with a low bow. I saw there eyes meet. Ah, I know the look. I've been young; and I told mother I wished it was Bob instead of Arthur Berryl. Mark! doubly wish it had been now!

Colonel Berryl was in love, and Annie Desmond was the girl. The Berryls brag great deal of family pride, but I think

"Fiat Justitia Ruat Cœlum."

CATHOLIC NEWS IN BRIEF.

—M. l'Abbe Lumentaque has been appointed chaplain of the Providence Convent at Terrebonne, P.Q.

—Four pupils of St. Dominic's Convent School, Harrow, England, have passed successfully the Oxford local examination (senior), three of them obtaining honors in Latin.

—Rev. Father Cambone, S. J., has sent from Tananive, Madagascar, to the Propagation of the Faith, a contribution for missions. The colors and size of these butterflies are remarkable.

—Brother Clementine, formerly President of La Salle College, Philadelphia, who was recently ordained a priest, has charge of the Christian Brothers of Kingsland, Long Island, Brooklyn, E.D., near the 17th ult., and shortly after sailed for France. He is undecided yet as to whether his headquarters will be in Paris or London.

A Copernican museum, something like that existing in the Pitti Palace of Florence, will be erected in Rome. The collection will be presented to the city of Rome by Dr. Arthur Wolynsky and Count Broschetti.

—The municipal elections recently held in Venice resulted in a victory for the Catholics. Out of eighteen candidates, no less than eleven Catholics have been chosen, and the seven seven non are of the Mezzina stamp.

—Next year will occur the centennial anniversary of the birth of one of the most illustrious prelates in America, Bishop Kenrick, who was born in Dublin, on the Island of Cork, Ireland, in 1786. The event, it is said, will be celebrated in Ireland.

—The Bishop of Nimes has begun an energetic campaign against Sunday excursions, and has published a pastoral on the French side of the Pyrenees. The sport is denounced as "the work of the devil," and Catholic newspapers have been forbidden to advertise or encourage it.

—The Diocese of Hartford is again called to mourn the loss of one of its priests by death, namely, Rev. Thomas J. Shea, who died at East New London. Father O'Donnell, pastor of the Church of the Holy Cross, was educated at St. Charles College and the Grand Seminary, Montreal, where he was ordained in December, 1882.

—Lord Clifford of Chudleigh, Eng., recently made known his sentiment of rebuilding the chapter of Buckfast Abbey in Devonshire. This abbey, which dates from the reign of St. Edward, was acquired not long ago by a community of Benedictines of the Primitive Observance, who were driven out of France. Lord Clifford represents one of the few English Catholics who in disunion which remained unstained by the persecutions and subsequent by the penal enactments of Elizabeth's government and that of her successors.

—The Catholic Union of Bolivia lately appointed the President of that Republic, Senor Gutierrez, to the vacant Cardinalship accepted the position, for which he expressed his thanks. He also sent a telegram to bestow a very high eulogy on the work done by the Catholic Union, and to declare that the Government would not submit to the doctrines of the Catholic Church.

—His Eminence Cardinal Sanfelice, Archbishop of Naples, has been decorated with the great cross of the Order of Charles III. The insignia were sent from Madrid, and the Cardinal Archbishop, Archbishop Capecelatro, and Prince Ischitella were accompanied the gift with a most eulogistic letter commemorating his Eminence's charitable work during the cholera year, and the zeal which prompted him to collect money for the cholera-stricken people of Naples.

—The Rev. Father Rudolf, Superior of the Redemptorists, has appointed Vicar-General of the Province of Upper Canada. He will be succeeded by Father Joseph Jackel, C.S.S.R., formerly assistant at the Church of the Holy Name. Father Fraser, C.S.S.R., assistant at the Church of the Holy Name, has been transferred to St. Mary's, Iowa Home, St. Helena, Father Welsby, R. J., of Stonyhurst, has been removed to Fairfax Street, Manchester.

At Rome, Italy, and Paris ever since the meeting of the Catholic Young Men's Club, the Sunday night the bursting of a bomb which shook the building and filled the hall of the meeting with smoke and fragments. Also so many anonymous explosives, did no other harm. The door had refused to open, and the meeting strongly resolved "Loyal to the clericals" and "Long live the Pope" and other like sentiments. The police duly rubbed them out, but declined to take the offenders.

—The scaffolding erected in front of the Church of the Sacred Heart, Rome, was completed on the 12th ult. The design, however, was very slight. This seems to have been done to spite the devotees of the sacred heart, who are numerous in that great work. The Holy Father had already promised that he would build the front of the church at his own cost. A collection was opened for the purpose, and the Catholics in order that the Pope should not be put to the expense, they have so far started only a few weeks ago, has already brought in nearly 12,000 francs.

—The Bishop of Tarbes, Pierre Hordas, the missionary sta.nced at Castle Garden, has been unanimous in character, and much good has resulted from it. For some time he has been engaged raising funds for building a new chapel and home for immigrants who need temporary aid. A report just issued by him shows that $12,275 90 has been collected and $5349 91 expended, leaving a balance in the hands of the Bishop of $6,926 79. The special contributors to the fund have been Cardinal McCloskey, Archbishop Corrigan and Ryan, Emigration Commissioner Lynch, Thomas Cleary, Meagher, Sheridan and Callanan, George Bliss and Miss Rose Delmonico. Father Riordan says that his mission will be for the benefit of all Catholic immigrants irrespective of nationality or religion.

OUR GIRLS.

The Happiness Spread by a Sister's Hand.

Many a home circle owes all its chaims to the girls of the family. Brothers come home to dull and often out of humor, ready, some of them, to quarrel with a straw if it happened to lie in their way. Mother is tired, and father worried, but boys hardly ever think of this. They want their dinner or their tea, the newspaper, their pipe, and somebody to sit by and help them, or they will make themselves and the rest of us feel they are eating it.

"Why is Hannah?" exclaims one, as he enters and sees his master's accustomed place vacant. Or this will be here directly, replies father or mother looking up from their work or needlework, and before the minutes are gone by, bright-eyed Hannah trips into the room and begins to pour out the tea.

The young man's face brightens up the moment he sees the cheerful countenance of his sister. "Why, Hannah!" exclaims one, as he enters and sees his master's accustomed place vacant. "Why, how glad I am to see you! I've been lonely enough without you, I tell you, since you left home!" Hannah's face flushes with pleasure, and the cup of tea she is pouring out is spilled in her hand, as she hurries to the other side of the table to hear what her brother has to say.

"Give me my slippers, Birdie," he says, kicking off his boots; it looks so cozy here I shan't care about turning out again tonight, and Birdie, like a good sister, takes the most bright and lovable place in the world. Birdie takes all the worry of getting the boys their tea, and setting them up for blocks, marching after a fashion and amusing mischief. At the corner of Prince street and Broadway she meets her sister and into Prince street, nearing the Cathedral. It was long after dark, and the lamps were lit and a great crowd was in the streets.

All expected a scene of turbulence and terror—a general rush, perhaps. Some had reached the barricade, and then it had to stop. It would take some time to remove it, and meanwhile the crowd could do no harm. Hand there who did not propose to be peaceably removed. And then the mob—the wind of and caught right of the armed men, waiting for their with surprise in the hands, behind the tombstones in the churchyard.

[illegible]

it might be, and the very silence there must have kept made this fact more impressive. There was not a word spoken by the would-be defenders of the Cathedral—not an exclamation was heard, not a threat was uttered; they had no breath to spare for words, they were holding themselves ready for the time of action. The silence was more dramatic and more suggestive of warning than any amount of noisy talk. The mob was evidently impressed by it. The mob raised a yell, but they were allowed to yell, and there was no yell passed in response. Not the muskets were held tight, and the bayonets gleamed in the pale light of the family glimmering inwn.

All is as still, but "armed stillness" is something terrible, and the mob were so paralyed by it.

They had hoped for opportunity to shoot or stab some one to their blood-thirsty satisfaction, and there they were somewhat. They were something allowed to do as they chose, and they naturally chose to do what seemed most prudent for their personal safety. They plunk away in the direction of the Bowery, where they crossed and swore and called each other names, and they found that it is safety, for "did" nothing else, save stride more or less rapidly away.

Who was the Cathedral's churchyard the defenders of the Cathedral and the Bishop? Simply, sinner—the men in the lane—the hands. It was a bloodless but dramatic rout, and old St. Patrick's Cathedral was saved.

HUMAN AND THE TEMPORAL POWER.

A Dutch journal, the Tijd, complains, in reference to Italian missions, of the spoliation of the Propaganda, and the Government is to be asked to take some steps to prevent the consequences of this act, and the spoliation of the Propaganda, which Humbert has proposed to the consideration of the Senate on the question of missionaries to be exempted from military service. The journal concludes with a plea for the support of the Catholic missions in its new policy of colonial extension. This is a vain hope so long as the Government of Italy is under Freemasons and restors the Pope to his independence.

—Monsignor Kayrath, Archbishop of the Chaldaic Rite of Farkehly, Mesopotamia, has come to London to study in the British Museum some very rare manuscripts in the Armenian Chaldaic language. He is charged by the Holy Father to publish an edition of the Chaldaic liturgical books.

DUTIES OF CATHOLICS TO THE CIVIL POWER.

SPIRITUAL AND TEMPORAL DOMINIONS CONTRASTED.

Practical Catholics the Purest Patriots.

with the Crown, Lords and Commons, is a Catholic creation and Catholic inheritance. The old English maxim that "custom is the mother of customs," is the life and spirit of Catholic politics, and no more human example of it truth can be found than in the succession of the Crown. We are not unmoved by Pyombard elections and by the perpetual canvass of conflicting parties, which in other lands comes surging up through every four years, with all its permanent and accumulating political and social mischiefs. Even in Rome, the life-blood extinguish by his unconscious influence the political life of Rome, and the life-blood of the party rivalry which torment and disturb the Italian Government. Rome, the sacrarchy of an hereditary crown dispels the mists of passion, of prejudice, of pride, and vanity. To aim at changing by force and violence the ancient, venerable, and sternly dear with it, is to aim at the Crown is the way to the gallows, or to Bedlam.

CATHOLICS MUST BE CONSERVATIVE.

Putting it therefore on the lowest ground, the principle of Catholic Conservatism is authority by the supreme custom of a great people is the Crown. Nothing is so stable and stationary there can be no consonance with Our Catholic Conservatism, which is the hereditary throne, resting upon the custom of law, vesting in a single person the dignity of the people's sovereignty, it does not in no more than the enlargement of the same custom. It perpetuates and vivifies the order of great services rendered to the Crown and to the people, but the exclusion of great services in certain, and that in no small number, of the Catholic people, the Catholic colleges, the institution of that class ever erected in this State, at Nyon, and the Bishops. This was also burned. Both these were conclusively proved to have been the work of bigoted and fanatical incendiaries, and one day the Bishop received a threatening letter warning him to burn the Cathedral, St. Patrick's itself, was doomed to fire and assault.

This was too much. Even the gentle Dubois had had enough of burning and destroying and was determined to protect the Cathedral at all hazards. The gentler the character, as a rule, the more dangerous he is when once thoroughly desperate, and Bishop Dubois was in a desperate mood. He armed the local militia. He warned the local authorities that he had been threatened, he had burned the Cathedral, and that he knew that no special heed was paid by the city authorities to his communications. He resolved to take the law into his own hands, and protect his property. Self-preservation is the first law of nature.

NO SO CALLED THE MOST PROMINENT

of his congregation together, showed them the threatening letter he had received, told them what he had done himself, and that nothing had been done by anybody else, and then asked them what they thought of it. His congregation assured the Bishop that they would do anything to protect him and a Cathedral from violence with their time and money; even with their lives.

one doctor of theology, or one of the congregation, or one of a priest, or a congressman, or one of the Church Militant."

The Bishop had seen a good deal of fighting on the other side of the water, and he knew an enemy when he saw it in the pulpit. So he got all sorts of military stores and provisions, and fortified the Church buildings connected with the Cathedral, putting the whole place into a state of defence, and keeping guard day and night against incendiarism or assaults.

He did this quietly, too, so quickly it didn't get into the papers even, not at least for a day or two, and then it was surprising for, and then he had some notices of his proceedings in the papers, but he did not let people know that he was ready for an attack, which he took for granted, and put the best right down to the attack at all.

A Mr. Lawrence Langdon acted as general manager, and he was known to be on terms under Bishop Dubois. He had some very hard-looking men made him all—men armed and knowing how to use their weapons if necessary, and some of the armed men by-the-by, was Mr. John Kelly. These men were thoroughly civilized, and, of course, they were Catholics and Irishmen, and, of course, they were Democrats, and, of course, they were Tammany Democrats.

All is as still, but "armed stillness" is something terrible, and the mob were so paralyed by it.

They had hoped for opportunity to shoot or stab some one to their blood-thirsty satisfaction, and there they were somewhat. They were something allowed to do as they chose, and they naturally chose to do what seemed most prudent for their personal safety. OUR GIRLS.

The Happiness Spread by a Sister's Hand.

Many a home circle owes all its chaims to the girls of the family. Brothers come home to dull and often out of humor, ready, some of them, to quarrel with a straw if it happened to lie in their way. Mother is tired, and father worried, but boys hardly ever think of this. They want their dinner or their tea, the newspaper, their pipe, and somebody to sit by and help them, or they will make themselves and the rest of us feel they are eating it.

THE WAYS OF DWARFS.

Characteristics of the Lilliputians. Possessors of Enormous Appetites.

"Nothing can make very small people so angry as to be called children," said a man, or, to be compared to children," said Mr. Tom Thumb, the famous dwarf, to Loeta Zarata—you know her—the Mexican lady, who is about half as tall as I am, but half the weight of a newborn babe, and pretty lady by the way. Tom Thumb is 27, and to all intents and purposes a man. He is twenty-five inches in his stockings. Well, now, she's just as sensitive about being called a child as I am. And it is noticeable that all dwarfs are that way. They want to be treated as men, and to be taken for men. They want to be taken for men. They want to be taken for men, and to be treated as men. They want to be taken for men, and to be treated as men. They want to be taken for men, and to be treated as

THE MONITOR.

TWENTY-SIXTH YEAR OF PUBLICATION.

THE MONITOR has the largest circulation of any Religious Paper published on the Pacific Coast.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1885.

THE ILLUSTRATED CHRIST-MAS MONITOR.

In accordance with our annual custom we will present our readers with a twelve page illustrated MONITOR at CHRISTMAS, and we desire to inform all press and postage stamps, that their contributions must reach this office not later than the least of the Immaculate Conception (December 8th) so as to order to get out our very large edition—the CHRISTMAS MONITOR will have to go to press on December 15th, so as to reach all sections of the Union by Christmas Day. Persons who desire extra copies to send to friends can have them mailed free, direct from this office, by sending in—at any time between now and Christmas—the addresses of those to whom they wish copies sent, accompanied with 10 cents in coin or stamps for each copy thus ordered for friends in the Eastern States or Europe. The CHRISTMAS MONITOR will be a most acceptable present to send to friends far away from those who dwell along the Pacific Coast, and we hope that hundreds of our subscribers will avail themselves of this liberal offer.

Editorial Notes.

—We hope that the great mass of MONITOR readers regularly perusse the articles on the "Hail Mary" which a devoted Christian Father so kindly contributes to our columns. This week's article on the nature and dignity of the soul of man is very especially interesting, and all Catholics who desire to know some new facts in the life of the Blessed Virgin, as well as to be able to realize the supreme honor attached to the virginal state, will gain a great amount of useful and beneficial knowledge by carefully perusing these instructive and edifying contributions every week.

—The magnificent article from the pen of Cardinal Manning—which we publish on the first and third pages of this present issue—is likely to command the attention of the reading public in every land where the English language is spoken. Long after its eminent author is dead the truths it contains will be cited in order to show the attitude of the Church concerning the many important civil and religious rights of Catholics regarding which it treats. Certainly no Catholic who desires to have a comprehensive idea of his duties to his Church and his country should fail to give if that attentive reading which such an able document from such an exalted source deserves.

—One of the most singular chapter of accidents ever noted since the beginning of the world, happened recently in France. A subjoqueen from that country states that Jean Coubrat, a mason living at Vallion, near Moulins, fell from a scaffold and fractured his spine, his injuries proving fatal. His brother Tranquille, on returning from the funeral with his brother-in-law Joliat, fell into the River Sanl and was drowned, such a bitter blow himself losing his life in saving his brother-in-law. After his fellow, the widow Joliat swooned away, and falling to the ground fractured her skull. Such a combination of calamities is surely without parallel.

—If we may judge of future results by present prospects, it looks as if Home Rule was already assured in Ireland. Gladstone's recent speeches, together with the question of Disestablishing the Anglican Church, has so divided and demoralized the Liberal party in England and Scotland that the Liberal candidates may look for defeat in many places which hitherto has been their stronghold. This split in the Liberal party means many a victory for the Irish Parliamentary party. Parnell is consequently jubilant. Hitherto he feared that Gladstone would succeed in compassing the difference between the Liberal factions, and would thus spoil many chances for effective work for Ireland in Great Britain. He now calculates that in a score of British constituencies, where the Irish vote is strong, the Liberal churchmen will oppose the Radicals, and that the Nationalist pick from this scores will exceed that of the Tories.

—Catholics no doubt will feel under many obligations to the daily press for inserting once in every by mangs of an expensive cablegram from Rome that "the Pope has written an Encyclical Letter in which he says that civil government is not an article of faith." (!) A fact well known to Catholics all over the world, and which is only believed by those non-Catholics who foolishly imagine that the Church needs a monarchy for its back-bone. We are also assured from the same remarkably unreliable source that the Pope "condemns the liberty of the press and universal suffrage." (!) All this goes to prove the perfectly trite which some people prefer to utter falsehood in preference to truth. The daily press is a dangerous literary staff to lean upon if we would learn truth.

—We sincerely hope that Senator Stanford's munificent gift of eighty-four thousand acres of land, together with bonuses and improvements valued at $5,500,000 for the purpose of establishing and sustaining a great educational institution in this State, will suggest to some of the rich Catholics of America the propriety of being equally liberal in their donations towards the Catholic University which the Episcopate is at present soliciting subscriptions for. Senator Stanford has proved himself a great and a magnanimous public benefactor by his largeness of heart and his foresight in thus distributing his wealth during his lifetime. The trustees who are to have charge of this vast and valuable bequest are Judge L. Sawyer, James Mott, Shepard, Chas. Goodall, Alfred L. Tubbs, Francis A. Spencer, Henry Vrooman, Charles F. The Congregational Club's Powwow over Purgatory.

Purgatory has ever been a stumbling-block to the Protestant mind. Many sectarians are so prejudiced against what they indignantly call "this Popish doctrine," that—in their journey through the next world—they would prefer even to go further and fare worse, than to accept the teaching of Rome in regard to Almighty God's place of temporal punishment.

Some Congregational cranks of the class just last week in this city and got up a kind of a Congregational circus over what some of them called "this curious Catholic doctrine," and in order that the readers of the MONITOR may have a non-bright into this peculiar vagaries of the Protestant mind upon this question, we give brief extracts from the principal objections advanced by some of the more prominent preachers and Protestant gentlemen present.

When the Congregational Club had elected Dr. Mear to the chair, it proceeded at once to find out for its own satisfaction whether such a place as Purgatory existed in the next world or not, and on this point the Evening Post says:

Rev. Dr. Noble fully approved the views set forth in the paper read before the club by Dr. Dwinell on the last meeting, and said he could never feel any hope held out in the Scriptures of probation beyond the grave. According to the Word of God, now is the accepted time and the day of salvation.

According to the Calvinistic creed of Dr. Noble, the child who steals sugar from its mother's closet, and the red-handed murderer—both go into the same everlasting hell for eternal punishment! Nothing difficult can enter heaven; hence those diplomatists scripture "Doctors" who say "they could never find any hope held out in the scriptures of probation beyond the grave," must read the Word of God with one eye on the text and the other on some sleek-looking widow passing their study window! Contuitions before that crucifixion system of sectarianism yclept Protestantism was born into the world to crush death in the midst of its victory, and to bring out of the Catholic Church decreed Purgatory to be an article of Christian faith based upon the Scriptures, founded upon the Fathers, and endorsed by every Christian principle which points to God as the origin of Justice and the source of Mercy! When Protestant preachers undertake to tell their poor deluded victims of misplaced confidence that there is no such place as Purgatory, they talk without warrant, they speak without authority against Scripture, and they hold up God to be lacking even the mercy and the justice which every mortal Judge on earth shows to his fellow-man! The Fathers used of old, and the Protestant preachers of the present day, are about the only people who have sufficient self-pride and egotistical "gall" to presumptiously declare their firm belief that their souls are so pure, so clean and so undefiled, as to be fit to enter heaven immediately after death! His brother Tranquille, on returning from the funeral with his brother-in-law Joliat, fell into the River Sanl and was drowned, such a bitter blow himself losing his life in saving his brother-in-law. After his fellow, the widow Joliat swooned away, and falling to the ground fractured her skull. Such a combination of calamities is surely without parallel.

SPIRITISM EXPOSED.

Few People are Duped by Pretended "Mediums."

Some of our correspondents ask how the so-called materialization of spirits is effected, and especially how the "Golden Bells" are made. The answer is, that the "Golden Bells" are made by the whole circle. It is from a Spiritist.

Spiritism is a great pleasure to be able to inform the public that a brighter day is about dawning upon long-darkened, long-persecuted Ireland. Home Rule is now a fixed fact, and the Irish Parliament, whether it be the Tories or the Liberals who have to grant it, will be assured. The Tarantism will another short eighty-five years, and the Irish people will make English an Irish language. Long live the Irish people! Long live the Irish Nation! Long live the Irish Parliament, and long live the Irish Parliamentary Party! Long live the Irish Parliamentary Party! Long live the Irish Parliamentary Party!

SEEDS AND PLANTS FREE.

Annual Distribution by Professor Hilgard at the University.

In accordance with the practice of former years the State University has announced its annual distribution of seeds and plants from the experimental grounds of the agricultural department. In calling attention to the distribution Professor E. W. Hilgard states that several new growths which promise well have been added to the list. The distribution is made for the purpose of ascertaining the adaptation and practical value of the several kinds to the different climates and soils of the State. Persons receiving seeds are requested to report results, whether success or failure, and if the latter, from what apparent causes. As there is no appropriation available to meet the expenses of packing and postage, applicants for the seeds are called upon to pay these necessary expenses, which are nominal. Application may be made for one or more kinds of seeds. If the applicants desire seeds sent by express no money need be sent with the order.

The following barleys and wheats will be forwarded by mail to applicants who send 30 cents for 1-pound seeds and 50 cents for 2-pound seeds: Six rowed barley of a very different type from that commonly grown on this coast, raised from seed secured in the Brenner collection, imported from Europe, where the grain is particularly valued for malting purposes. Bulk—it is recommended for trial in the northern valleys of the State; rice, spring or bastardeen barley, somewhat similar to the foregoing; Bestal Whittington wheat, pronounced a good flouring wheat; black-bearded Centennial wheat; California spring wheat from Germany, under that name, but not yet identified with any variety generally known here; white Siberian spelt wheat; St. John's Day rye, from seed imported from Kitzuki, Germany; Swedish oats.

Seeds of the three following grasses will be sent in 6-ounce packages, 5 cents each: Schreder's brome grass, valued in Australia as resisting drought, and in Texas as giving good feed in winter and early spring; Hungarian brome grass, from seed imported by the University from Europe, examined by the French as adapted to dry soils; black medic or yellow trefoil; small alsike from Southwestern Spain; tagasaste, species of broom or brush-like plant, recommended by the Australian Consul at the Azores Islands as a valuable forage plant for dry hill lands. Tested packages of root stocks of over-grown millet will be sent for 25 cents each. Professor Hilgard describes the black wattle or tan bark acacia of Australia (sonnat decurrens), the seed of which will be sent in a two-ounce package for 4 cents.

The seed for the Dalmatian and Persian insect powder plants will be furnished in one-ounce packages for 2 cents. All applications for seeds or plants should be addressed to E. W. Hilgard, Berkeley, Cal. The professor will also gladly furnish any desired information in regard to seeds or plants.

Tears of a Baby.

I think there is no sadder sight on earth than the tears of a baby. To see the little round face that looks as if it were only made for laughing, all twisted up in a maze of puckers, the bright eyes squinted out of sight, and great, real tears coursing down the pudgy cheeks, is enough to make a stone weep in sympathy. It is as if the man in the moon were crying. I know an English father who, whenever one of his babies—and there was a host of them—cried, would say in a tragedy sigh and cough that "he's rather sow a few-pen note than one of these tears, say he," and it seemed to those little men to be the height of derision and self-denial on his part.

Mrs. Peddock, a writer of Salt Lake City, tells a pathetic story of a broken-hearted little girl whose first baby never cried about her wept in silence all the time. Sleeping or waking, the tears flowed from the eyes, and in a few weeks it died, its mother said of a broken heart. It had shed all the tears its mother had expressed before its birth, and its weeping face was a symbol of the face of of Utah. In anything to them and facts is a memory we nearly all can conjure up of some fat, usually baby who would cry and cry and cry until every member of the family was exhausted in his cause, when he would suddenly nubestion his eyes and lo! not a tear would be there. It had been a crocodile tear of the direst grief.

A Word for Wives.

Little wives, if ever a half-suppressed sigh fled place within you, or half-unloving word escaped you to the husband whom you love, let your heart go back to some tender word in those first love days; remember how you loved him then, how tenderly he used you, how timidly you responded; and if you can feel that you have grown unworthy, true for the same fond love now. If you do feel that through many cares and trials of life you have become less lovable and attractive than you were, turn—by all that you love on earth, or hope for in heaven—turn back and be the pattern of loveliness that was him, be the "dear one" your attractions made you then. Be the gentle, loving, winning maiden still; and doubt not, the lover you selected will live forever in your husband. Nestle by his side, cling to his love, and let his confidence in you never fail; and my word for it, the husband will be dearer than the horse was. Above all things, do not forget the love he gave you first. Do not seek to "reconquer" yourself—do not strive to unsex yourself, but love the higher honor contained by the fortress of old—that of a loving wife. A happy wife, a blessed mother, can have no higher station, needs no greater honor.

The Duty of Scouring Well.

Do not disdain dross and the little niceties of the table; you may be a very clever woman, perhaps even intellectual, but, for all that, you cannot afford to be careless in these matters.

No woman with any sense of self-respect should allow herself to sink into a dowdy, but, whatever her brain, vexations and disappointments, the should dress as well as her position will allow.

Do not imagine that we are advocating extravagance; on the contrary, simplicity is our motto, which if united to good taste, will be found more effective in the eyes of husband, father, brother or lover than the most costly attire.

A simple bow in the hair may look quite as fascinating as a diamond aigrette; and a plain dress, if neat and prettily made, may be as becoming as silk; indeed, we have often seen a simple costume eclipse a silk.

We mention this to illustrate the fact that riches are little compared to taste, and that every woman may dress well if she chooses; that, in fact, it is her duty to herself and those around her to dress as well as her position will allow.

"A little fire is quickly trodden out
Which, being suffered, rivers cannot quench."

Procrastination may rob you of health, increased diligence you can make up the loss; but if it rob you of life the loss is irremediable. If your health is delicate, your appetite fickle, your sleep broken, your mind depressed, your whole being out of sorts, depend on it you are seriously diseased. In all such cases Dr. Pierce's "Golden Medical Discovery" will speedily effect a positive, radical cure—such a cure that you will save you from the tortures of lingering disease.

Family Fun.

Missed the Mouse.

Mrs. Jamison is a Brooklyn lady, and she had a very sore finger, caused by striking the wrong nail while laying carpets. She had procured the finger of a kid glove, and used it for a finger-stall. The thrifty hangs a tale.

While cleaning house the other day she disturbed a mouse, and it ran into one of the bureau drawers, where it was lying on the floor. Mrs. Jamison is not a timid woman by any means, but, women-like, she called for her husband. He was sleeping soundly in another room and she hesitated to send with father.

"Snestle!" he asked, with his mouth full of song.

"There's a mouse in that drawer, and I want you to help me to kill it."

Mr. Jamison isn't at all fond of mice, and he's rather go without them than pay an exorbitant rate for them, but he didn't want to oppose afraid, so he went out into the kitchen and procured little Tommy's baseball bat. He climbed up on top of the bureau, and told Mrs. Jamison to "fetch on her mice.

"I'll lift the clothes out," she said, "and when the mouse jumps you squash him."

She grabbed the clothes out one by one, and finally Jamison saw the mouse jump. There he stood, at all, upon the bureau, and went through the looking-glass, while Mr. Jamison went into the garden to howl.

They don't communicate with each other now, for what Jamison mistook for the mouse was the finger-stall on Mrs. Jamison's finger.

A Very Sad Case.

The Rev. Mr. Whitescarver may be in many respects a most estimable man, but he has apparently adopted the Jesuitical principle that it is lawful to do evil that good may come. In a conversation in a recent number of the Richmond Religious Herald, he relates the following conversation held by him with a sister in denominational kernel: "Oughtn't we to let our horses lay on Sunday?" asked the sister, which Mr. Whitescarver replied: "Yes, I think we may give the Sunday rest to our horses." How Mr. Whitescarver can justify this advice, except on the plea that the end justifies the means, it is difficult to see.

The sister want of respect for Sunday which is evinced by domestic fowls is very painful to right-minded people. Hens not only lay eggs on Sunday, but they starvards ceeds over the fact in a noisy and rowdy irreverent manner, and then spend the rest of the day in the servile labor of digging worms. The sin evidently has no conscience and no respect for the convictions of her owner. She would as soon lay an egg on Sunday as on Saturday, and expostulations and remonstrance have no effect upon her.

In these circumstances what ought the "sister" mentioned by Mr. Whitescarver to do? Obviously it is her duty to see to it that her hens do not lay eggs on Sunday. To permit the hens to go on in their wicked course is manifestly to give countenance to wickedness. She cannot clear herself of complicity with the hens by giving the eggs to missions. As well might the owner of a lottery try to atone for his violation of the lottery law by giving part of his profits to missionaries. If it is wrong for hens to lay eggs on Sunday, it is the duty of the "sister" to keep them from laying. If she listens to the entreaty and immoral advice of Mr. Whitescarver she will be hardly less guilty than her hens.

The proper course for the "sister" to pursue is to its strings to the legs of all her hens on Saturday night and compel them to swing hand downward all day Sunday. No hen wants to swing by the legs long in such a position, nor would she have spirit enough to cackle. A solemn sermon would reign in the hennery from morning to night, and the hens would be glad to keep Sunday in a quiet sed happy way. Were Mr. Whitescarver a sub-guide he would have told the "sister" how to prevent Sunday from secularization in the part of the hens; but alas! he has chosen instead to encourage the sister in what she seems to be in order that Methodist missions may profit thereby.—N. Y. Times.

The Champion Relic.

First relic hunter—I've got the head of the last mad dog in the last village on General Grant's birthplace—cost me only $1 50 too. I mean to keep it always.

Second dito—Pooh! why didn't you get something worth while when you were about it? I've got the earth from under the fifteen hundred and twentieth foot-print of the General's horse, when he rode to accept Lee's surrender at Appomattox. I had every it in a box in my pocket as long as I live.

Bystander (contemptuously)—You are a measly crowd for relics. I picked up something in a street through which the funeral procession passed, that I wouldn't give for fifty such relics.

Relic hunters (in chorus)—What was it?

Bystander—Myself — when the crowd parted me in two. I've decided to have it buried in my coffin.

A Story He Didn't Believe.

"Now, there's a story I don't believe," said the colonel as he laid aside an enclosure. "What story is that, colonel?" asked the erudite and industrious assistant.

"Why, that paper says Octopasi can sometimes be hard five hundred miles."

"Don't you believe it?"

"Of course I don't believe it. I'll bet there isn't a singer in the world that can be heard half that far.

"But Octopasi is a volcano, colonel."

"Is it! I thought it was one of those Italian fellows that go about with Punch."

Some Pumpkins.

Mr. Choate, the well-known New York lawyer, was recently sitting in his law office when a young man, who takes great pride in his family connections, and has a pretty high opinion of himself generally, entered and introduced himself as follows:

"I am J. Rensselaer Jones."

"Ah," replied Mr. Choate, "take a chair."

"I am—er—the son-in-law, you know, of Governor Smith."

"Indeed!" replied Choate, "take two chairs."

Complimenting the Ruby.

Young Mother (displaying her first born to company of the room above)—Is she not a dear little thing, Major Beeswax? Do you notice what a sweet little double chin she has?

Major Beeswax (a bachelor)—Yes, and I'm somewhat surprised.

Young Mother—Surprised!

Major Beeswax—Yes, ma'am. From what I have heard during the past night or two I fully expected to see a triple chin.

NEWS OF THE WORLD.

CABLEGRAMS FROM ALL COUNTRIES.

Police Outrage in Ireland.

A very extraordinary occurrence took place recently in the quiet town of Ballina, County Mayo—a sergeant, with a strong posse of his constabulary, entered a country house in this locality, where the parochial clergy were accustomed to assemble at their stations, where Mass was recently being celebrated, and arrested several of the parishioners engaged in the devotional service, at the instance of a Lord Lansdowne. The Rev. Father Heally, curate to the respected parish priest, Rev. Canon Gibbons, P.P., V.F., was officiating at the moment, and was attended with illness, and now lies suffering from a dangerous attack of fever.

Jackie and Maguire.

Jackie and Maguire, who pronounce him to be a very critical condition. The greatest indignation is expressed throughout the country at this act. An inquiry will shortly be made in order to test the legality of this atrocious affair, and have the whole circumstances investigated before the House of Commons.

Relics of Christopher Columbus.

Rome, Nov. 1.—Some of the Roman papers declare that, with a view of stimulating interest in the celebration of the fourth centenary of the discovery of America by Columbus, the Charities Hall has published that the remains of the latter twenty years ago in the possession of Prince Colonna, of Rome, and that the widow of Columbus when the latter was sent back a prisoner to Spain in the year 1500. The Chronicles says he obtained these valuable relics after a long and expensive journey made in Spain and Americas for the purpose, and that he had kept the story of his discovery and possession a secret for twenty years for private reasons which no longer are binding on him.

Rich Mines in Old Tuolumne.

Mr. Richard Pearce, of the Mineral Institute of Tuolumne, Tuolumne county, Cal., has taken out some 30,000 pounds of quartz on the Eagle quartz mine above Soulsbyes ferry. Some six years ago, Mr. Pearce, in company with others, struck upon a rich vein, discovered by a singular accident. Once the rabbit was a large bowlder which Mr. Eagle dislodged in the bottom of a flat, was put to feed as the quartz went to dinner, on their return, in removing the rock, they found it was full of gold. It is reported that Joseph Wolfin, the owner of the land bright, has just struck another pocket 18 ft. in claim near Alisup Flat, from which he has taken the large sum of $30,000.

A Siberian Priest Proved at Pasteur.

The French Professor Pasteur, who has made himself famous by inoculating men and cattle with disease germs to insure them against subsequent attacks of the same, has now to prove that discovery by a humble priest of our own country. In 1866, when the Siberian plague was killing the cattle in that place, Father Andrew Joskinsky of the Trotsky village, resorted to a desperate remedy in order to save his cows. He got some blood from a dying cow, saturated threads with that blood, and passed these threads through the ears of the healthy cows, numbering eleven. At the place where the cows were practiced there appeared tumors of the size of pigeon eggs. In a short time these tumors disappeared, and the cows remained alive and healthy, while all the rest in the vicinity of the village perished. Cologne Gazette.

Interesting Relics from Bishop Dowd.

By cable is announced the death of the Rt. Rev. Patrick Francis Dowd, Bishop of Derry and O'Connor, Ireland. The lamented prelate was a native of County Antrim. He was educated in Maynooth. His administrative abilities as a priest were admirably exhibited, and when the feeble health of his aged predecessor called for a Coadjutor, Dr. Dowdon was named by universal consent. Pope Pius IX ratified the nomination with right and enthusiasm. On the death of Dr. Dowdy, Dr. Dowdon left more at Derry to strike the Episcopal Chair. Bishop Dowd was a Tory Unionist, especially in Belfast, the hot bed of orange ascendancy. A steady Unionist himself, and one who knew from experience how bigoted tyranny meant the new Bishop took his stand firmly and was a very popular.

In 1866, there were but three churches and about 12 priests attached to the Catholics of Belfast; now there are eight churches, at least 40 priests, establishments, and the Catholic population of nearly 100,000. It is an aggression to say that to the earnest, zealous and willying labors of the deceased prelate these wonderful results are due. He was a patriot, a gentleman, Rt. P. Dorrian will have a void in the Irish episcopal ranks not easily filled.

Idaho's Rich Mines.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 4.—Edward A. Stevenson, Governor of Idaho, in his annual report, says the wealth of the Territory will surpass a hundred-fold, and the population will reach 100,000 in the next decade. The Territory is now in a very prosperous condition. New and rich mineral districts are being discovered and worked with great success. The Wood River mineral belt is yielding, and has shipped from 100 mines to 300 ounces. The great Salmon River basin continues to output its gold and silver, as in former years. The new lava district is fast coming to the front, and is the wonder of the Territory will, before the end of the present year, be reached by a railroad from Kelton, Utah, and Ogden. The Oregon Short Line is now at work on the development of the rich mines in the New Youth district, but, when opened next week, there unless are expected to take place among the best-paying mines on the Pacific coast. There are now over 200 dividend-paying mines in the Territory. The Governor says that not one half of the truth has yet been told of the richness and extent of the Placer Mines on Snake River.

In the Coeur d'Alene region new mineral discoveries have been made, and rich silver veins within will soon become noted for their gold properties. The Governor recommends that the Legislature authorize the issue of Territorial Bonds to the amount of $5,000 for the Territorial debt. The total assessed valuation of property for 1883 was $13,497,596, an increase of $2,500,000 over the preceding year. The population of the Territory is estimated at 75,000, and the value of the gold and silver product during the year is $3,496,000.

EVERY YEAR.

BY PATRICK DEAN

The spring has lost of brightness
Every year,
And the stream a ghastlier slightness
Every year;
Nor do summer flowers quicken,
Nor do autumn fruitage ripen,
As they once did, for wanderer
Every year.

It is growing darker, colder,
Every year;
As the heart and soul grow colder
Every year;
I care not nor for dancing,
Nor eyes with passion glancing,
Love is less and less entrancing,
Every year.

Of the loves and sorrows blended
Every year,
Of the joys of friendship ended
Every year,
Of the ties that slight bind me
Until Time to I until resigned me,
My individuality resolved me
Every year.

Oh! how sad to look before me,
Every year,
While the clouds grow darker o'er me,
Every year,
Where we see the loadstone failed,
That to bloom we might have added,
And immortality paled
Every year.

To the past is more sad I know
Every year,
Come no new ones in their place
Every year,
Everywhere the sad eye meet us,
In the evening dark they greet us,
And to meet them returns us
Every year.

"You are growing old," they tell us,
Every year,
"You are more alone," they tell us,
Every year.
"You can ill bear new affection,
You have only recollection
Deeper sorrow and regretting
Every year."

Think not, o clouds are chilling,
Every year,
Or the land by which we're drifting
Every year,
No times there will grieve us,
Nor loving faces leave us,
Nor death if friends forsake us,
Every year.

CATHOLIC NEWS IN BRIEF.

—It is intended to start a Catholic Church for the benefit of the Chinese, in Brooklyn.

—Another affiliation to the long list of distinguished English converts to the Faith is Mrs. Bancroft, the eminent London actress.

—"God bless them all" (the clergy of his diocese) were the last words uttered by the Eminence the late Cardinal McCloskey.

—The Capitol, of the Hague, a Protestant organ, advocates the resumption by Holland of diplomatic relations with the Holy See.

—Rev. Kenelm Vaughan sailed for Havre, from New York last week. He is to enter a Dominican priory in the south of France.

—A charitable Catholic of Philadelphia has given Archbishop Elder $100,000 with which to re-open and maintain St. Mary's Seminary in Cincinnati. His brother left he Rome last month.

—The Archbishop of Quebec has been empowered to treat with the local government regarding the property of which the Jesuits were plundered in 1776.

—The expulsion of Russian colonists from the Prussian provinces is only limited to Catholics. Orthodox and Polish Jews, Protestants and schismatics remain unmolested.

—The Rev. Fathers Cook, O'Shea, Kerns and McLaughlin, Redemptorist priests from St. Louis, who gave missions in this place, are giving a mission in St. Columbkill's, Chicago.

—The Sacred Heart Seminary, now under the Fathers of Mercy, was recently dedicated by Rt. Rev. Bishop Farrelly, at Wanaque, N. J. It was originally built for the use of Methodists.

The Bar of Gold.

"Look Ned! Look now. It is like them curious things you found in Jonas's nest, isn't it?"

"No, I'm not! Not looking over his sister's shoulder. "Nell can't help giving!"

"This sun's so good, and Nell so musically."

"I wish I could do anything, Nad, I'd paint a nice lot of flowers to hang over your bed."

"Do, Nell!" Jim exclaimed.

"Yes, make that for us, Nell." Ned added, as he looked admiringly upon the drawing on the table. At this moment the little sufferer turned her face toward the speaker, and a woman's voice

"If I were your father I'd take them into out of you nightly quick, miss."

The girl looked up, turning a frightened face to the speaker. Her lips trembled, but she mastered her emotion as she replied

"I washed the dishes, me, and swept the kitchen."

"After I told you a dozen times or more. Why don't you hunt up your clothes and see the things are in them, instead of putting all the work on me?"

"I'll mend them, ma. I didn't think it any harm to learn to draw and paint a little."

"Learn to paint. What does a doll like you know about drawing? It's downright lamness and I'm going to see your father's going to encourage it, when you ought to learn to make your own clothes. When I was as old as you—" The supposed head of the house came in at that moment. Mrs. Chapman turned to him wrathfully.

"The girl's had half the impudence to talk back to me because I spoke to her about attending to her own clothes instead of letting away her time in nonsense as usual."

Mr. Chapman who, after taking to himself a second wife, discovered he had voluntarily placed a heavy yoke upon his neck, looked at the little pale face and knitted his brows in a

"My father did not intimate a doubt of the truthfulness of your statement, he only expressed surprise at it, and I thought say, oh! by the way, what is your name?"

"Nellie Chapman."

Young Mr. Hagan looked meaningly at his father. His son, the elder Hagan said something in a low tone to his son, and the latter asked abruptly

"How old are your father, Miss Chapman?"

It sounded so strange to be called Miss Chapman that she was thrown out of her amazed to say "The doctor thinks he may live a while."

"If he is," said the elder, in a peculiar tone, "very old—unusually old."

"Not at all," she said, "he is not so heard of years since sister."

"Well, I hope he should say so. He should avoid so Nell suddenly, then, "My child—Nell, I scarcely know which to say of it. Bear pat it in Hagan's mind and then dropped

"Now that is precisely what I do not know to do," said Hagan, jr.

"Why, Hagan, I know where I obtained the design. I imagine that is for pattern, as, cousin, I know the exact story details that may occur to him in prospecting the design, or Nell's father.

"You are right—quite right. And you, Miss—this is the case—a wonderfully strange coincidence—I'm sure you'll excuse me, but I must know where you

Girls, Learn to Cook.

Yes, yes, learn how to cook, girls and learn how to cook well. Why right has a girl to marry and go into a house of her own unless she knows how to superintend every branch of housekeeping, and she can not properly superintend unless she has some practical knowledge herself. The fact is that man do not think enough of this; indeed most men worry without thinking whether the woman of his choice is capable of cooking him a meal, and in a pinch he is sharp-sighted, as his health, his cheerfulness, and indeed, his success in life, depend on it. In fact the whole household is influenced by the diet. Feed them on fried cakes, fried meats, hot bread and other indigestible viands, day after day, and they will need medicines to make them well. Let all girls have a share in housekeeping at home before they marry; let each superintend some department by turns. It need not occupy half the time to see that the house has been properly swept, dusted and put in order, to prepare puddings and make dishes, that many young ladies spend in reading novels which unstrung both the mind and body and unfit them for every day life. Women do not, as a general rule, get pale faces doing housework. Their sedentary habits in overheated rooms, combined with ill-chosen food, are to blamed for their bad health. Our mothers used to pride themselves on their housekeeping and fine needlework. Let the present generation add to it but of real accomplishments the art of properly preparing food for the human body.

Twenty Reasons.

A good many people cannot understand why the female portion of the community prefer sober men. The matter is simple enough.

1. Wives like sober husbands because they can reason with a sober man.
2. The sober man is companionable.
3. Sober men have pride, and pride is a woman's main hold.
4. Sobriety means a comfortable home.
5. Good clothes for mother and children.
6. A house of your own.
7. Evenings at home instead of in a barroom.
8. Better health and enjoyment of life.
9. An elevated view of life and a sense of your responsibility.
10. You are a credit to your wife.
11. People that once despised you will now bloom you.
12. Your word will be gauged as you result the temper.
13. Young man will pattern after you.
14. You will be an ornament to society and the whole town in which you live.
15. The whole community will take pride in you and wish they had more like you.
16. Your friends and family will appreciate you.
17. Your enemies will admire your path of sobriety.
18. Scoffers will be disarmed by your works
19. Your manly qualities will grow with your years.
20. God will bless you.

Walking for Health.

There is almost no limit to the physical development and health that may be gained and maintained by walking which is done for the purpose of exercise. Any one can find time and space in which to walk; and one can find congenial company for such a purpose. A prosperous husband is not the company at such times, for with him business of most inevitably degenerate

Family Fun.

They had Studied Human Nature.

Some weeks ago a widow moved into Hetrect from a town in the western part of the state. She brought with her a bulldog which showed game in every movement, and it was not long before the boys bullied and spoil in the neighborhood wanted to buy that dog. The widow wouldn't sell at the price. The next thing to buying the dog was to get up a fight between him and some other rascal of bloodthirsty appearance, for the widow couldn't bear to this.

"I want you to understand," she indignantly replied, "that I am a respectable woman and give no encouragement to such things."

Still, there were one or two men who did not despair. They began to conspire, and as a result they led a fighting dog into a barn near the widow's house the other day, and one of them paid a call at the house and said

"Is course we know how you feels about this dog fighting. We feels the same, but there's a woman across the alley who owns a dog which she brags on."

"She can't be no lady," was the retort.

"Exactly, mister, so she wouldn't speak to us she does."

"Speak of me! Why, I don't know her."

"Is course you don't, and I should hate to tell you what she says of you."

"Did you mean?" I asked talking about me! I want to know what she says."

"Hit, ma'am, you'll know me, you know."

"No, I won't! What does she say."

"Well, then, begging pr'on pardon, she makes fun of your red fuzz."

"She does?"

"And she ridicules your dress."

"The vixen!"

"And she says she never saw such feel on a woman."

"We've got her dog in the barn, ma'am. It's a dog she brags on. She was saying yesterday that if her dog could only get at your dog once there—

"But he can! You go into the back yard and unzip Bruce and take him over there! If he can't lick your dog I'll dress him Bruce!"

"Exactly, ma'am, and you can trust me to see fair play. The arrogant head of such a slandered, humiliated woman should be humbled, you know, and its you who will do it.

The dog was taken to the barn, and he did not disappoint his backers. After a fight of fifteen minutes he was declared victor, and as the referee gave his decision the widow's voice was heard to remark:

"Good! That pays her for abusing my hair. I'll fix her on the big feed before the week is out."

She had been watching the fight through the cracks of the barn.

RELIGIOUS PROFESSION AT RED BLUFF.

RED BLUFF, Nov. 29th, 1885.

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR.

Dear Sir—It was my great pleasure to witness, on the 27th inst., the very impressive night of the religious profession of Miss Mary Lucy in the world, Miss Mary Ignatia in the order of the Sacred Heart of Jesus.

Such a sermon, as the text, Judge, I was filled with the innocent faces of the blessed children, all teaming with joy and delight, as little by-standing, I which they had the hard, but never had the courage to do, thus a beautiful mantle just looking sub-woman-hood, formally surrender all that we cast the door to her in this world, to offer to her God her heart, her life and her love. The beautiful ceremony was performed by Father Parker, Rev. J. Hoey, assisted by the Clergy of Chico, who did his part most gracefully. The ceremony of the Sacred Vestments and effecting to each of the Novices, the emblems of their order, the white veil in black, such to the sanctuary of price, who much prefered the white. Another dear girl has been added to the glorious army of noble women who, under every tie to promote the greater glory of God and the happiness, temporal and eternal of their neighbor.

PROSPERITY OF SAN DIEGO.

A correspondent writing from San Diego says, that everything is prospering in that city. Nearly $600,000 has been expended in the city in improvements during the present year. Hundreds of fine houses have been built, and hundreds of others are now in course of construction, and no doubt, will be completed before the end of the year. Hundreds of people are now in San Diego who will be followed in their wake by hundreds more, who will be followed by thousands, who will be followed by tens of thousands, who will be followed by hundreds of thousands, who will be followed by millions, who will be followed by tens of millions, who will be followed by hundreds of millions, who will be followed by thousands of

THE THREE SONGS.

BY A. POTTS.

DEDICATED TO MY FRIEND MISS A——E ——.

"Oh! Sing me a song of perfect joy!
Said a tender child to the minstrel old,
And the minstrel sang of his love to him
And his rapturous song extolled.
The beauty of every thing around,
The music of every rill and brook,
The songs of the birds in every nooky bye
Thrilled gladness and sunshine round childhood's nook.

He sang of all that was sweet to see
And the happy child clapped his hands in glee
"Thy Song is a Song of Joy to me."

"Oh! Sing me a song of perfect joy!
Said a weary youth to the bard so old,
And the minstrel sang his love to him
And his glowing arts sweetly told
Of a golden haired lass whose brilliant eyes
Were fair as the liquid tints of the skies.
Her cross the lad wore, and said he as she
And she! so eager for none one's love!
He sang of all that he should be
And the youth lay bound in an ecstasy
"Thy Song is a Song of Joy to me."

"Oh! Sing me a Song of perfect joy!
Said an aged man to the Harper old,
And the slumbering power of the minstrels lyre
Awoke, and to solemn grandeur told
Of a peaceful end to all care and strife,
Of the glowing dawn of a happier life,
Of a land where all was Virtue and Truth,
He ended the glorious Poem of Youth
And the listener trembled—no longer he
"Thy Song is a Song of Joy to me."

FOREVER.

(FOR THE MONITOR.)

Those we love truly never die,
Though from our sight they may be hid;
They are flowers, types of life and death,
Are laid upon their grave.

For death the pure life saves,
And life all pure is love, and love can reach
From Heaven to earth, the soulless human tree;
Then those by mortals reach

We think that in life who have a dear one dead;
A friend he has whose face will never change
Who encourage or approve of what we do
And a suspicious course of life in anyone
Who, however dear to her, She will cast down, accordingly, I pick up the knife. As she was in the act of rising, however, the treacherous villain drew a dagger from under his coat, and caught her by the nape of her neck, gripping her throat tomy with his fingers to prevent her screaming the alarm.

"Now, Jane," he said, sneering out a bad oath at the same time, "where is your master's money? I'll have that or your life, or else your honour."

The terrified girl would fain have parlayed with the ruffian, but he would hear nothing she could say.

"Your master's money or your life, lass," was all the answer he vouchsafed to her entreaties and adjurations.

"Choose quickly, lass," was the only alternative he offered her; "the grave or the gold."

She was there was no hope of mercy at his hands, and, as she saw it, her native resolution awoke in her breast. Like the generality of her sex, she was timid in trifles; a scaredy was a subject of fear to her; but if blood caused her to faint, an unwonted sound filled her soul with fear in the night the Sun when her nerves were aroused by an adequate cause, she proved, as many other women have done, no lacking in endurance, in presence of mind, and in resolution. Any stranger looking at her, just been bold, in which small act the Spartan were hatched upon this poetry form.

An Offensive Breath

is most disagreeable, not only to the person afflicted if he have any pride, but to those with whom he comes in contact. It is a definite sign of a cause of, but it has parted not only friends but lovers. Bad breath and catarrh are inseparable. Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy cures the worst cases in thousands out testify.

Literary Miscellany.

The Miller's Maid.

There in a lonely mill, close beside the little hamlet of Lidset, near the Rhine shore, between the village of Hefeld and Ilrad, on the left bank below Hoam. This mill is said to have been the scene of the following story.

It was on a Sunday morning, "ages long ago," that the miller of Nesset, and his whole family, went forth to their church, the Mass at the nearest church, in the village of Hoam. The mill, with its adjacent residence, was left in charge of a servant-girl named Hannchen, or Jenny, a short-hearted lass, who had long lived with him in that capacity. An infant child, of an age quite for church, was left in her charge likewise.

The girl was busily employed in preparing dinner for the return of her master and his family, when who should enter all of a sudden but an old swetheart of hers, named Heinrich Heinlier. He was an idle, gracless fellow, whom the miller had forbidden his house, but whom Jenny, with the amiable perversity peculiar to her sex, only liked, perhaps, all the better because others gave him no countenance. She was glad to see him, and she told him so, too; and although in the midst of her work, she not only got him something to eat and drink, but also found time to sit down with him and have a gossip, while the dinner was being cooked. As he sat, however, he felt his wife.

"Pick that one up, lass," said he, in a thing say to its good-natured girl.

"Fy, Heinrich," she replied, "your back should be more supple than mine, for you have less work to make it stiff. I labor all day long, and pay no nothing. But, never mind! I would go hard with me if I refused to do more than that for you, bad though you be."

This was spoken half spitefully, and half in good earnest; for, kind-hearted as the girl was, and much as she liked the scapegrace, she was too honest and industrious herself to encourage or approve of idleness and a suspicious course of life in anyone else, however dear to her. She did so, down, accordingly, I pick up the knife. As she was in the act of rising, however, the treacherous villain drew a dagger from under his coat, and caught her by the nape of her neck, gripping her throat tomy with his fingers to prevent her screaming the alarm.

"Now, Jane," he said, sneering out a bad oath at the same time, "where is your master's money? I'll have that or your life, or else your honour."

"Choose quickly, lass," was the only alternative he offered her; "the grave or the gold."

She was there was no hope of mercy at his hands, and, as she saw it, her native resolution awoke in her breast. Like the generality of her sex, she was timid in trifles; a scaredy was a subject of fear to her; but if blood caused her to faint, an unwonted sound filled her soul with fear in the night the Sun when her nerves were aroused by an adequate cause, she proved, as many other women have done, no lacking in endurance, in presence of mind, and in resolution. Any stranger looking at her, just been bold, in which small act the Spartan were hatched upon this poetry form.

An Offensive Breath

is most disagreeable, not only to the person afflicted if he have any pride, but to those with whom he comes in contact. It is a definite sign of a cause of, but it has parted not only friends but lovers. Bad breath and catarrh are inseparable. Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy cures the worst cases in thousands out testify.

and bolted the door the only apparent entrance to the edifice, every other means of egress access to the interior being fastened by means of strong iron gratings fixed against all the windows, and then took her post at an upper casement, determined to await patiently either her master's return, and her consequent delivery from her dangerous position, or her own death, if it were ordained.

"Never," said she to herself, "never shall I leave my master's house a prey to such villains, or permit his property to be carried off before my eyes by them, while I have life and strength to defend it."

She had barely time to secure herself within, when the ruffian from without, with a sharp knife in the other, assailed the door with kicks, and curses, and imperations of the most dreadful character.

"Confound thee" he cried, applying the Italian epithet of which the free-speaking Teutonic language is so copious, "open the door, or I'll break it down."

"If you can, you may," was all the robber girl replied. "God is greater than you, and to him I place my trust."

"Curse thy trust!" roared the ruffian in response to this advice, "that will bring her to reason."

Short hearted as poor Hannchen was, she quailed at the cruel suggestion. For a moment her resolution wavered, but it was only for a moment. She was that her end death was certain if she admitted the assailant, and she knew that her master would be robbed. She had no reason to hope that the life of her infant would be spared by her compulsion. It was to risk all against nothing, to surrender a certain, conveniently held fast in her hand to abide as she was while life remained, or until assistance could reach her.

"An ye open not the door," shouted the villain without, accompanying the words with the vilest abuse, and the fiercest imprecations, "I'll hack this whole limbs to pieces with my knife, and then burn the mill over your head. Twill be a merry blaze, I trow."

"I put my trust in God, replied the damsel, "and I tell thee that ye not within those walls whilst I have life to prevent ye."

The ruffian had the infant for a moment in his power, and he knew that "on bantitles wherewith to execute his latter threat. In this search he espied, perhaps, the only possible clandestine entrance to the building. It was a large aperture in the wall, overhanging with the chaff which was stored in the upper story of the mill, and the other machinery of the mill, and was quite entirely unprotected, for the reason that the simple occupants had never apprehended it would be given to seek his mission through such a dangerous inlet. He had not long with his discovery, the ruffian returned to the infant, and, tying the hands and feet of the little innocent, threw it on the ground near as a butcher will fling a to a lamb destined to the slaughter, to await his return. He then stole back to the aperture, by which he hoped to effect an entrance. All this was unseen by the damsel in her chamber.

In the meantime her mind was busied with a thousand contingencies. She clearly perceived that no excuse would be tolerated to effect an entrance, and she knew that on the exclusion of her's depended her own safety and that of her infant.

"It is Sunday," she said to herself, "the mill is not working on the Sabbath; suppose I say it agong now! It can be seen afar off, and happy my master, or some of his neighbors, wondering at the sight, may hasten home to know the cause. Lucky thought, she exclaimed; "tis God sent it to me."

No sooner said than done. Being all her own, she set fire to the mill. Meanwhile the ruffian had reached the aperture, and was about to enter. With this disaster the destruction of the bales of supplies it was not strange that the home organization became impetuous. The Fitrish to remount decided to remove the bales with those which had been preparing to spread, and the machinery as well known in the times of Emmet and Mitchell and Meagher and others to be brought into play. The leaders were arrested and imprisoned, or compelled to flee. Hitch wings now being overcome there was nothing left to do "unless a lost cause." The hopeless left on the ex-chief excited and the Fenian army military commander. This was not the first failure and it was not altogether pitiless, as so far by the great success of the Fenian movements now going on under Parnell and his associates. We were advanced at antecedent less than a decade, and are about to answer the Parliamentary Commission of Inquiry in Ireland, but the genius and patriotism of Ireland will be found equal to the task of rolling up her cause where Stephens, John and others left off, and, even as they would mature and express their plans, the Irish National Land League was formed from the ashes of the Fenians, and a copy of all Ireland now stands the leading Patriotic of the world in the religious field, and the material field, and the political field, and the social field, and the literary field, and the scientific field. Perhaps the most popular and successful of this class is the Annunciation of Ireland's Patron Saint, Patrick, and the Irish Organization. It is a branch of a prosperous association existing in Ireland, and, as it is the most popular and good, and. But for this organization the Repeaters and Scotch Leaguers would have utterly frustrated. As it was, the right of the domain that operated in the people for the great O'Connell's benefit. By this organization all the Irish people in the great heart of America was aroused into synchronous action with such a vision, and such a fire as has not been witnessed since the days of the Fenians. The father here his home, my in his arms, he hid out the room afterwards in child was tied, but was unable to obtain any account of the matter, ordinary circumstances that had occurred from the hiding of the child.

Hannchen, in a few words, told all, and then the spirit which had sustained her so long and so well while the emergency lasted, left her, and she fell down in a faint, from fallen sensation, the arms of the miller's old eatson, and was with great difficulty recovered from the effects of the mill was at once stopped, and the inanimate ruffian dragged forth from the great wheel. The other ruffian was brought down from his prison, and he was, in turn, bound—and sent off to Bonn under a strong escort; and, in due course, came under the hands of the executioner.

It was not long till Hannchen became a bride. This happy event was the subject with a thousand congratulations. She clearly perceived that no excuse would be tolerated to effect an entrance, and she knew that on the exclusion of her's depended her own safety and that of her infant.

"It is Sunday," she said to herself, "the mill is not working on the Sabbath; suppose I say it agong now! It can be seen afar off,

THE MONITOR.

TWENTY-FIVE YEARS OF PUBLICATION.

The MONITOR has the largest circulation of any Religious Paper published on the Pacific Coast.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1885.

THE ILLUSTRATED CHRISTMAS MONITOR.

In accordance with our annual custom we will present our readers with a twelve page illustrated MONITOR at CHRISTMAS, and we desire to embrace as many and precious writings, thereby, that their contribution must reach this office not later than the feast of the Immaculate Conception (December 8th) in order to get out our very large edition—the CHRISTMAS MONITOR will have to go to press on December 15th, so as to reach all sections of the Union by Christmas Day. Persons who desire extra copies to send to friends can have them mailed free, direct from his office, by sending in—at any time between now and Christmas—the addresses of those to whom they wish copies sent, accompanied with 10 cents in coin or stamps for each copy that ordered for friends in the Eastern States or Europe. The CHRISTMAS MONITOR will be a most acceptable present to send to friends far away from those who dwell along the Pacific Coast, and we hope that hundreds of our subscribers will avail themselves of this liberal offer.

Editorial Notes.

—The Church in America is in a very flourishing and prosperous condition. The present Government does all in its power to foster the religious spirit. "Catholic Union" showed and embrace all classes. The Bishop of Linz has addressed a letter to the members of these circles, encouraging them to propagate Christian sentiments and patriotic aspirations.

—The Archbishop of Cologne makes his solemn entry into that diocese during the present month. Great preparations are being made for his reception. It is now a long time since Cologne had a resident Archbishop, Cardinal Melchers having been exiled. It will be a sad blow to the new Archbishop, Mgr. Krementz, to learn that 348 out of the 813 parishes of the diocese are without pastors.

—Upon a thorough investigation of the charges brought against the Commandant at the Veteran's Home, we are satisfied that they were greatly exaggerated by certain inmates who were expelled from the institution for good cause. We have no desire to censure any official unless there is good ground for such a course of procedure concerning any other of our public institutions, and in the present case we see nothing to justify us in pushing th's matter any further at present.

—In consequence of the great length of the important Encyclical of the Sovereign Pontiff, which we publish in full on our first and eighth pages, we are compelled to crowd out Correspondence, Irish news, Editorials, our regular contribution on the Blessed Virgin, and other matter prepared for this issue. For the same reason we are compelled to refrain from pointing out the prominent features of the Encyclical until next week. In the meantime we hope this important document will receive careful perusal from every subscriber.

—In a recent lecture delivered in Kingstown, on "The Maldi and his Men," by Mr. James O'Kelly, M. P., he told his audience that if England refused to give back to the Irish people their own Parliament, they might find allies in the Soudan that might be made useful. The Soudanese only required a little money and a little intelligence to direct them, and it was within the power of the Irish people to strengthen them in such a way that the Soudan might become, not the grave of an army, but might be made to become the grave of an Empire.

—The Prussian Government, being asked by the Fathers of the Congregation of the Holy Ghost, who have a mission at Cameroon, in Africa, where Germany is founding a colony, if they might establish a college in Prussia for the evangelization of the Africans, answered in the negative. The reason alleged was that the May Laws prohibit the erection of religious houses in Prussian territory. The Government added that they had entered into a contract with a Protestant Society at Basle, the object of which was to prevent the residence of Catholic missionaries at Cameroon. This is what is called "religious justice" by those who call themselves Protestant Christians.

—This being the last month of the year, we will send bills to all our subscribers in arrears, and we hope to receive ready response in the shape of cash, currency, postal orders or postal notes from all who are indebted to this paper. We are expending a large amount of money every week in order to furnish our patrons with as good a Catholic paper as there is in America, hence, when we give such good value in return, it is but reasonable to expect prompt payments from our patrons. All who receive bills, therefore, will please respond promptly so we can balance our books early in January.

—Father John Kenny sent us a copy of his new book, "The Knowledge of Christ and its Mysteries," this week, which we will notice in our next. He also sends us those cheering words which will fall gratefully up on the hearts of hundreds of his friends all over the coast. "I am, thank God! perfectly restored to health, but my doctors will not permit me to travel before next March. In public I am free to say that Parnell is sure to win Home Rule. It is delightful to see the unity and determination of the people all over Ireland. Dublin is grand and its Archbishop its inspiration. May God bless him for his good work!" To all of whom every reader of the MONITOR will gladly show "Amen!"

—In the death of Peter Donahue both the Church and the State have lost a generous giver and a model citizen. He was truly a self-made man whose sterling honesty, skill and industry made him what he was—the foremost man in California enterprise. His private charities go churches, communities and individuals were numerous, while, as a public benefactor, he was prominent in every movement for the good of religion or morals. Those who will mourn most are the widow, the orphan and the digent poor, numbers of whom he helped periodically. His friendship was a link never formed it could not be broken so long as those he thus favored acted in an upright manner. And thus the great good Peter Donahue did in life lives after him, and prayers for his soul's peace will ascend like incense to heaven, from the tongues of those thousands whom he helped in his passage or his purse, during his long and useful career in a land that should never let his name pass into obscurity.

Parnell Outlining a Constitution for the Government of Ireland.

Home Rule is assured to Ireland, if we may judge by the political complexion of the election returns, and we learn from our Irish exchanges that so convinced is Mr. Parnell of this fact that he has already commenced to outline a Constitution for Ireland, by which the people of that land will be empowered to legislate for themselves on all matters of local interest. He also proposes to abolish the fossil of British aristocracy known as the House of Lords, and to have but one representative body politic which will assemble every year in Dublin, and issue such laws as may be required for the reorganization of the commerce of Ireland, the regulation of the coinage, the levying of local taxation, and all matters directly pertaining to Irish interests except the army, the navy, and national defence—which are to remain the sole province of the British government.

It is Mr. Parnell's intention to introduce this document under the title of "A Bill for the Better Government of Ireland," at the first opportune moment after the next British Parliament assembles. Then he and his colleagues will continue to block all parliamentary business connected with English or Scotch legislation until the claims of Ireland have been heard and Mr. Parnell's measure acted upon favorably.

The importance of having men around him in Parliament who will neither desert the cause of Ireland through British bribery, or absent themselves from the House of Commons when Irish measures are coming up for consideration, has been considered in the selection of good and true men to represent every Irish constituency. And, as Mr. Parnell plainly said in his reply to the Edinburgh speech of Mr. Gladstone, Ireland's freedom will assuredly be achieved if two vital conditions are fulfilled by the people of Ireland. The first of these is to keep the Irish people at home and abroad united and free from quarrels and dissensions amongst themselves; that this united people should be true to the great traditions which they have inherited, and as it rests in their power, to strike to day what the Irish Parliamentary Party believes will be a successful and a last blow for Ireland, that they will not shrink from striking hard and striking home. Second ly, Mr. Parnell requires that those who are entrusted to bear the Irish flag in the Parliament of Westminster shall be men who shall sink all personal considerations, who shall maintain the same union in their ranks that the Parliamentary party of 1880 to 1885 have maintained during the last Parliament; that they shall crush Tory with an iron hand all dissension in their midst, and, above all, that they shall believe in themselves and in the work that they have in hand. And—added Mr. Parnell—if these two conditions are fulfilled, we have a united people and a determined body of men believing in their work, showing by every act, by every thought, by every word, that they believe in the right of Ireland to obtain national self government, then the day will not be very far off when you will have the gratification of witnessing the assembly of an Irish Parliament on Irish soil with full power to guide and watch over the destinies of the Irish nation.

Causes which Lead Protestants to Hate the Church.

In many cases the prejudices which exists in the minds of non-Catholics against the Church is created, fostered and perpetuated therein by the disgraceful and disedifying conduct of Catholics themselves. Every Catholic who becomes intoxicated is an argument to the uninstructed non-Catholic that the Church does not consider drunkenness a crime. Every action of deceit, dishonesty or other disgraceful proceeding entailing sin upon the Catholic soul, creates a hatred against our holy religion in the hearts of those who only know its dogmas through the conduct of those Catholics whom they see around them. Good examples on the part of many practical Catholics has led millions of souls to embrace the truth, while the bad example of incorrigible Catholics has made well-meaning Protestants shudder at the religion that is professed by so many who mortally sin against God by their habitual vices.

Catholics—more than any others in every community—should be models of virtue for their fellow-men. God has given to us graces which non-Catholics can never possess. He has provided Sacraments by which we may be purified, strengthened and rendered sinless in the sight of God. He has given us heavenly advocates who pray for us before His throne so that we may constantly walk in the path which leads to eternal bliss. But, unfortunately for themselves, there are Catholics who never have recourse to the Sacraments, who never position the Mother of God or the saints to intercede for them, and thus they fall themselves and are free to say that the Faith the Son of God died for into the mire of their own iniquities. Such Catholics as these it is who light the fire of prejudice in the hearts of non-Catholics and whose disreputable lives lead many Protestants to believe that there can be no real Divine life in our religion when such reprobate lives are led by so many who profess it. How necessary, therefore, it is that every Catholic should so square their manhood before his fellow-men that they will be impressed with the supernatural strength of purity, skill and industry made him what he was—the foremost man in California enterprise. His private charities go churches,

How Many Catholics are in the World?

A subscriber in the Sandwich Islands, who says that he had a controversy with a non-Catholic neighbor regarding the number of Catholics in the world, wants the editor of this paper to give him the necessary information upon that disputed question, and believes doing so we desire to inform our correspondent that he may not expect to satisfy his Protestant neighbor by any figures he may present to him. So powerful is prejudice against the Catholic Religion, and that not one in a thousand are willing to admit that Catholics number even one million in every ten millions claimed as our Church counts. Even so self-instructed an English Protestant as John Henry Newman—the eminent convert and Cardinal—in his Apologia intimates that to his youth he knew nothing whatever of the existence of any Catholic body in England. He had a fond idea that there was a building called a Catholic "chapel" in some obscure place in London, but as to the religion professed by those obscure people known as "Papists," he had little or no knowledge. The "sect" as he had heard it called by his Protestant friends—had but few adherents, and was considered as "alien" to the English soil.

We desire to deprecate the growth of the Church still exists, especially among the more bigoted class of our "separated brethren," who are determined to live in the belief that the Catholic Church will die before death calls them to their last home.

And when we Catholics set the number of our co-religionists in the world at two hundred millions, the statement drives the doubting Thomases of Protestantism to the brink of despair. Yet, notwithstanding this demonstration not to believe, on the part of our Protestant friends, there are actually more than 270,000,000 Catholics in the world at this time, as can be verified from the following statistics copied from the Kathotischer Mission Atlas, of last year, and other European publications equally reliable.

The total Catholic population of the world as given by the work we have quoted is as follows:

Europe	150,000,000
Asia	1,500,000
Africa	1,500,000
America	over 72,000,000
Australasia	1,125,000
Oceanica	375,000
Total	226,500,000

But, as the editor of the Atlas remarks, these figures are not as complete as he would desire in order to make his statistics thorough, hence he makes the calculation that the total Catholic population of the earth is 214,370,000.

In another work entitled Die Staaten Europas, 1884, edited by Dr. Brosbidl, the Director of the Department of Statistics in Austro-Hungary, that official gives the Catholic population of Europe alone at 150,900,000, being nearly six millions more than those given in the Atlas already quoted.

Hubner's Geographisch-Statistische Tabellen, compiled by Professor Juraschek, is standard work on statistical information in Europe, and in the edition for 1884 the total Catholic population of the world is set down at two hundred and eighteen millions, or 15·2 per cent of the whole human race. But the most recent authority on this point is the Annuaire Romain, which possesses facilities for securing reliable statistics not enjoyed by the coach of ordinary writers, and in whose pages it was stated a few weeks ago that from estimates made by the heads of the several missionary establishments throughout the world, the returns of Baptisms, and other reliable statistics—the total number of members of the Catholic Church is actually between 275,000,000 and 300,000,000.

Taking all these figures together, it is safe to say that there are from 275,000,000 to 300,000,000 Catholics in the world at the present period, as it must be borne in mind that there are vast sections of the world in Africa and Asia where thousands of the natives have been converted to the true faith but from certain causes statistics rarely reach the civilized portions of the earth. Catholic missionaries have been laboring in Africa for the last forty years, and to day there are from 20,000 to 30,000 Catholics in South Africa, with about 100 churches, to minister with religious, schools for the young, a hospital, a home for the blind, and many other admirable institutions. In one country in Africa, there are between 8,000 and 10,000 children who are receiving instruction in the Catholic religion. In the interior where very little progress was made a few years previously, Kings have asked for missionaries, and one or two thousand people are under instruction. This is a glorious victory for the Catholic Church.

It is also to be borne in mind that in all pagan and non-Catholic lands there are missionaries who do not think it wise to make public the number of converts they have gathered into the fold of Christ, fearing thereby that they might arouse a spirit of antagonism to the Catholic Church, hence such prudent priests never publish to the world the triumphs they achieve over Satan among pagan or idolatrous nations.

These facts and figures, we opine, will be sufficient to satisfy any unbiased non-Catholic that there are fully as many millions of Catholics in the world as the statistics we have given indicate.

We spent last Sunday at Sonoma, and nobly say that it was a day thus.—Rev. Fr. Mahony's Cal. Christian Advocate.

We have often heard that "an open confession is good for the soul," and we sincerely hope that the candid admission on the part of our venerable Methodist confrere will have a beneficial effect upon the spiritual health of our separated brethren. Sonoma is famed for its wine, and we presume—in all charity—that the insidious influence of the inspiriting fur-famed fluid overcame the scruples of the good old gentleman, and, as the rosy liquid lubricated the interior regions of our religious friend, he felt the promptings of his heart to "tell the world." The Protestant bible tells its readers not to look upon wine when it is red, but Rev. McCrary is too good a theologian to be caught sleeping concerning Sonoma wine, and so we presume.

He evaded the bible as well he might, By drinking Sonoma wine that night.

OUR BOOK TABLE.

ELEMENTARY TREATISE ON ALGEBRA for the use of the students of the Academy of the Pacific, Professor of Mathematics in Santa Clara College. San Francisco: A. Waldteufel, 737 Market Street.

During the heavy rains that so thoroughly soaked the deeper soil of our broad and beautiful wheat patches, a closely-wrapt stranger protected our sanctum. With our metal good nature we at once attended to his better comfort and proceeded to audit the contents of that capacious and fertile intellect, which—there they lay before us a neat, new Algebra for the use of beginners. Author, Rev. J. Bayma, S. J. Publisher, A. Waldteufel, 737 Market street—one copy.

Months at close possession of an alphabetical form of address, we opened the book and wondered—as by the method of computation we endeavored to master its contents—that it should have taken so long after subject—when the author's preface terminated put us in the right track in our solution of this self-assumed problem. In the preface we learned that Father Bayma selected to work out to write a new and exclusive treatise on algebra, as it is to exhibit—in a clear form—the results of experience in teaching youth so pertinent to that science. And this—perhaps—together with their proofs, are deemed quite sufficient to warrant the publication of an extensive four years' course of mathematical study—geometry, plane and solid analytical trigonometry, plane and spherical; calculus, differential and integral, as well as mechanics.

That this object is fully realized by the author either by his new book will be evident to any one who may examine the following extracts, or any one who has had the pleasure of a personal acquaintance, and inspect the clear, concise and logical manner in which the author presents their reserve in the study of the science, by way of theoretical proof and practical illustration. In this method we think the student will find a strange relation to make his side familiar with the technical language of his future toilsome, but delightful study. The author has taken pains to furnish the student with the definitions the three angles of the rectilinear triangle, the equal angles, the equal combinations of class and coefficients, and we take it for granted that in this course of time "McCrorie's definitions" will become one of his household treasures.

Now a word—from the training youth to the study—on this "low science" in the first place, it is a science of reasoning, and, in order to still keep their fidelity, or, rather, the characteristic of the Scotch character, he adopts "means" into a fixed proportion of space and time. This we believe, Father Bayma's accomplishes, and therefore we give it a hearty endorsement.

There is only one suggestion we offer to the Rev. Professor, and it is that he—not into a set of mechanical—but into a mental form—assumed task on the part of the pupil (for example) the author, and the decided tone of a time fixed manner when the absence of a system enables to verify his preparatory solution; and when the author or doubt his better judgment will condescend to add to the next edition of his work the little page—with reliable answers to the several problems.

We congratulate the students of Santa Clara on their being just in possession of so clear and easy a guide which is to stamp their first step in the long road that leads to a place in the temple of the exact science, and to other aspirants for the same laurels we recommend the careful study of Father Bayma's Algebra, and, if they be too tempted to discouragement than from other more exhaustive algebraic manuals.

DEATH OF PETER DONAHUE.

Sketch of the Life of One of California's Mighty Dead—What he accomplished through Enterprise and Integrity—A Liberal Benefactor Towards the Catholic Church.

Peter Donahue, the well-known pioneer and national millionaire, died at his residence at the northeast corner of Bush and Sansome streets last Thursday night. His death was painless, and was brought about by the failing of his strength, owing to his been going for the preceding twelve months, and he quietly breathed his last and quiet, and with scarcely a tremor to indicate the dissolution.

For some time he had been in feeble health, and about a year and a half ago, he was compelled to relinquish the active business which he had for many years conducted, and to do not feel the strength to bear pertaining to the management of his business affairs, and he was confined to his home. In the prime we learned that Father Lagmas celebrated a mass in his house, and he received the last rites of the Church, which he had been a liberal and devoted supporter during the time of the office. Shortly after this

CALIFORNIA FRUIT.

Importance of the Proposed California Fruit-Growers' Union.

NEW YORK, Nov. 19.—Reports received from San Francisco of the organization of the California Fruit-growers' Union have been much discussed in the fruit trade here. At the recently organized Foreign Fruit Exchange, the Secretary told your correspondent that the movement has attracted wide spread attention in the East. Letters have been received asking the extent of the California organization, the plans for the coming season, etc. Prominent foreign dealers, with whom your correspondent conversed, admitted the importance of the proposed organization, though claiming superiority for foreign grapes and oranges over the native product, besides greater cheapness. A careful investigation elicited the fact that the only known firm here who make California green fruit a specialty have a small warehouse on Vesey street pier. Their fruit comes almost entirely from Washington Porter of Chicago. They sell largely to hotels, groceries and local way fruit stores. The dealers say they have a monopoly of California fruit in the city, and make their own prices. They received about fourteen carloads of fruit from Chicago during the past season.

Albert Merritt of the Merritt Fruit Company said he had been experimenting movement by the California fruit-growers. Their fruit has been badly handled in the East. The Chicago people who handle most of it have a system of treatment of fruit has been not East to New York. "I made an experiment," said he "with California oranges last season, ordering a carload just at the close of the Florida season and the result surprised me. I found the fruit delicious, with a tender pulp and free seeds, far superior to the Sicily oranges. California fruit should be sent direct to New York. Delay at Chicago is apt to spoil the fruit, which reaches there in a good condition. I don't approve of refrigerator cars unless they are run differently. The fruit gets spoiled at the start by an insufficient quantity of ice being placed in the cars. The men in charge of the cars wait till they get to the mountains where ice is cheaper before fully stocking the car."

Phillip Rothman, a dealer in Florida fruits, said: "When California wants to a central agency in New York for the sale of their fruit. As it is now, no one knows where to go for it. With fast fruit trains and lower freight rates, it is possible to build up a big trade here, and take it out of the hands of middlemen.

A member of the firm of Maxfield & Co. said: "I think most of the dealers in Florida fruit here would be glad to handle California products if they had a way to make it pay. In my opinion, it is only a question of a few years when native fruit will drive foreign fruit out of the market altogether. Oranges from Florida we consider superior to those of California, but the latter beat the Sicilian fruit all hollow. The railroads will have to reduce freight rates still more before Pacific Coast fruit can be laid down here at a profit."

A prominent commission merchant strongly identified with California interests in New York, said: "The difficulty in successfully placing California fruit in this market is the same as with wine from the Pacific Coast. Neither is seen here at its best. To meet with the fullest success it is a matter of the greatest importance that the fruit should be placed in the hands of purely American houses in the East. Foreigners here are doing much to ruin the California trade. Fruit carefully packed from this end of the line, fruit-growers can make this enterprise a gigantic success. If, however, they send carloads of fruit here without knowing exactly how much the market can stand, it is sure to result in a heavy loss."

Since commencing this dispatch your correspondent learns that there has been a serious discussion in the fruit trade as to the advisability of placing California fruit on the foreign fruit exchanges.

Simple Cures for Sickness.

SICK HEADACHE.—Its complaint is the result of eating too much and exercising too little. Nine times out of ten the cause is in the fact that the stomach is not able to digest the food has introduced into it, either from having been uneatable or excessive in quantity. A dish of tea and bread, with ripe fruit or berries, with moderate and continuous exercise in the open air will tend to keep up a gentle perspiration, will generally set everything in a very short time. Two teaspoonfuls of powered charcoal in a half glass of water, and drank often, gives instant relief. Sick headache with some persons comes on at regular intervals, and is the signal of distress which the stomach puts out to inform us that there is and over-alkaline condition in the blood; that it needs a natural acid to re-store the battery to its normal working condition. When the first symptoms of headache appear, take a tablespoonfuls of lemon juice clear, fifteen minutes before each meal, and the same dose before bed time. Follow this up until all symptoms are passed, taking no other remedy, and you will soon be able to go free from this unwelcome nuisance. Many will object to this because the remedy is too simple; but many cures have been effected in this way.

RHEUMATISM.—Rheumatism is a terrible enemy in an English magazine makes the following remarks on the relation of diet to rheumatism, which are well worthy of consideration: Rheumatism is, so often so not, caused by over-eating, and especially over indulgence in meat, which is certain to cause an excess of uric acid, and render the body liable, on exposure to wet or cold, to an attack. We know the old people are peculiarly liable to rheumatism. The reason for this is not far to seek. Their joints and bosoms are harder and stiffer, and very often contain deposits—crusts of soda. Another is that, as a rule, people up in years eat more than is necessary to support life, under the mistaken notion that they want a great deal of nourishment to keep them up. Very then, on the contrary, the wear and tear of tissue is trifling even speed to what it is in earlier manhood, and that far less food is required. Therefore, if an elderly person would live long and be free of aches and pains, and be calm in mind—for this is a great deal—he or she must live abstemiously, more or less.

SORE THROAT.—One who has tried it communicates the following about curing sore throats: One ounce of camphorated oil, and five ounce worth of potash. When any soreness appears in the throat, put the potash in a half a teaspoonful of water, and with it gargle the throat thoroughly; then rub the neck thoroughly with camphorated oil at night before going to bed, and also pin around the throat a strip of woolen flannel. This is a simple, cheap and sure remedy.

Repentedly to Women.

"Sweet words are repeatedly to women," said the gifted, but naughty Mrs. Partington. "Surely we'll be lost women when we repent." Such facts are complaints that only women know, that are caused by exposure to sudden changes of weather. There is hope for those who suffer, no matter how long, or severe, they may be. Dr. V. Pierce's "Favorite Prescription" Sale in Health. It is a blessing, especially to mothers and women, for, for when women suffer, the household is sadness.

—A twelve year old Dakota girl, taken up into the air by a cyclone, carried out of sight, and brought safely down in a field a quarter of a mile away, describes her sensation while in transit as that of being rapidly and constantly pricked by thousands of needles. Hence her experience also has been similar to a person with Mt. Vibous chance.

Family Fun.

He Had a Good Memory.

"I never did have any luck, nohow," wailed an old man on a train out from Chicago. "Here up to town to see my son-in-law and get him to help me, but he won't do a thing. I don't know what I'm going to do for a living. All this comes from being so foolish as to stick to one of them old pensions."

"Well, you see, some years ago I was partly well off. Had two farms and a lot of stock, an' money in bank. The chap that's now my son-in-law come along an' courted my darter. He was as poor as a church mouse, an' as I opposed the match. But the old woman was fast for it, an' I had to give in, an' I usually do when the old woman gets her dander up. I wasn't very cheerful during the wedding, an' was all the time thinkin' of the check I'd ought to give my darter on ten dollars a week. After it was all over an' they was about to start, they asked me to show my shoe after 'em for good luck. Well, I did, an' that was the cause of the hull trouble. The young man had all the luck and it blew worth a hundred thousand dollars, while I am as poor as thunder. Yesterday I asking him to loan me a hundred and he refused me point blank. You see, he hasn't forgotten the time I threw my shoe after him."

"Why should he be mad about that?"

"My foot was inside the shoe."

She Paid Extra.

A widow, whose age might have been forty, went into business on Grand River avenue a few weeks ago and the dear move was to get a sign painted. The services of a sign painter were secured, and when he finished his work he put on his "imprint" by placing his initials, "W. A. H.," down on the left hand corner of the sign. When the widow came in critical admiration, she queried:

"What does 'W. A. H.' stand for?"

"Why, Wanted, A Husband," replied the painter.

"Oh, yes—I see," she mused. "It was very thoughtful in you, and here's a dollar extra."

How the Colonel Put It.

"I am very sorry that I did not get acquainted with you until I had become a widower," said Colonel Percy Yerger to his second wife with whom he does not live very happily.

"What do you mean by that?" asked the partner of his joys.

"Nothing, except that I would much rather that you had been my first wife," replied the fond husband carelessly.

"Why do you wish that I had been your first wife?"

"Because some other woman would be my present wife, darling."

Put it on the Slate.

A little boy was trudging along the street with a slate under his arm, when a man kindly stopped him and said kindly

"That is right, my little boy. I love to see little boys who are anxious to learn and are fond of going to school. Here's a nickel for you."

"Thank ye, mum," said the little boy.

"Now boy, you are a nice little fellow."

"Yes, mum, I am a nice fellow."

"For your father?"

"Yes, mum; he keep a saloon on Second swayer."

The Sapient Schoolboy.

Stern Father. "Look here, young man, your teacher tells me you extend yourself from school by telling that story about your sister sick. What do you mean by lying to your teacher, eh?"

"I didn't lie."

"Yes, you did. Your mother isn't sick, and you know it.

"She said she was."

"Why?"

"Last night. She said she was sick of having you home home all the time, and in the morning with your coffin on your achine."

"Well, of course, if she was sick, it would perfectly right for you to stay out of school, my son. There, here is a dollar. Go off and get some candy, and we won't say any more about it.

He Knows Now.

"I don't understand this at all, said Smith, as he looked over the bill.

"Why, it's a bill for a year of house rents at 625 per year," replied the collector.

"Bronte rises! Why, I never bought such a thing in my life. We have a house in the house, but they were a wedding present."

"Presented by whom?"

"My my friend Green."

"Exactly. He told us to wait three months, and send the bill to you. That has come to be the fashion now, and I'm surprised that you didn't know it. I'll receipt it. Thanks. Fine weather this."

An Affliction of the Eyes.

"Now, Bobby," warned the old gentleman as the family sat down to dinner, "your mum't brother Mr. Feathery with foolish questions. In the presence of older people little boys should be seen, not heard."

"I was only going to ask him one!" said Bobby, with an injured air.

"All right, Bobby," laughed Feathery, very much amused. "Go ahead. I wouldn't be too hard on Bobby, Mr. Handcricks," he continued, turning to that gentleman, "little boys are all alike, the world to them is full of the strange and inexplicable. And, after all what are we but children of a larger growth! Er—what is it Bobby, that you want to ask me?"

"I was going to ask you about your eyes."

"My eyes!"

"Yes, you says that a silver dollar to you looks as big as a cartwheel."

Couldn't Outrun His Pa.

A Sunday school teacher was telling her children how the devil is always in the morning lion seeking whom he may devour, and after the lesson was through she asked that those who wished could ask questions. At once a little boy spoke up and asked how fast the devil could run.

"Hush, Johnnie," said the teacher, "such questions are very profane.

"Well, I didn't care, said Johnnie, "he can't outrun pa anyhow, 'cause I heard pa tell a man down the street the other day that he thought he could lick the night he came home so late from the lodge."

account the more so, because Catholic men are bound by the admonitions of the doctrine which they profess, to do what has to be done with integrity and with faith. If, on the contrary, they were idle, those whose opinions do not in truth give any great hope of safety, would easily get possession of the reins of government.

THIS ALSO SHOULD BE ATTENDED

with caution, that those who are powerful who are badly disposed towards the Church; and those least powerful who are well disposed. Wherefore it is evident there is just cause for Catholics to undertake the conduct of public affairs; for they do so in a manner that responsibilities in order to approve of what is not lawful in the methods of government at this time; but in order that they may turn them very to whole, as far as may be, to the unmixed and true public good, holding this purpose in their minds, to infuse into all the veins of the commonwealth the wisdom and virtue of the Catholic religion—the most healthy pap and blood as it were. It was scarcely done otherwise in the first age of the Church. For the manners and desires of the heathen were divergent as widely as possible from the manners and desires of the Gospel; for the Christians had to separate themselves incorrupt in the midst of superstition, and, always true to themselves, most cheerfully to enter every walk in life which was open to them. Models of fidelity to their princes, obedient, where lawful, to the sovereign power, they established a wonderful relationship of civil concordance, they sought the advantage of their neighbor, and to all others to the wisdom of Christ; heavily prepared to retire from public life, and even to die if they could not retain honesty, or the majesty of nor the supreme command with unalloyed virtue. For which reason Christian customs soon found their way, not only into private houses, but into the senate, into the camp, into the imperial palace. "We are of yesterday and we fill your everything, cities, islands, cortes, municipalities, councils, camps, the rank and file of the army, the officeships, the palace, the senate, the forum" (Tertullian, Apol. c. 37), so that the Christian faith, when it was unlawful publicly to profess the Gospel, was not like a shield crying in his cradle, but grown up and steady enough to firmly, was manifest in a great part of the State.

it is as well to have these examples of our forefathers. For Catholics indeed, as many are worthy of the name, believe all things it is necessary to be, and to be willing to be, regarded as most loving sons of the Church whatsoever is inconsistent with this good report, without hesitation to reject; to use popular institutions so far as honesty can be to the advantage of truth and justice; to labor that liberty of action shall not transgress the bounds ordained by the law of nature and of God; so that such that the whole of public life shall be transformed into that, as we have called it, a Christian image and likeness. The means to seek these ends can scarcely be laid down upon one uniform plan, since they must suit places and times very different from each other. Nevertheless, in the first place, let concord of will be preserved, and a like sense of things to be done sought for. And such will be attained the best, if all shall consider the admonitions of the Apostolic Chair as oracles, and shall obey the Bishops whom "the Spirit of God has placed to rule the Church of God" (Acts, xx. 28). The defence of the Catholic name, indeed of necessity demands that in the profession of doctrine which are handed down by the Church the opinion of all shall be one, and the mind perfect concordance, and from this point of view take care that there be no occasion to say degree at false opinions or resists with greater goodness than truth will allow. Concerning those things which are matters of opinion, it will be lawful with moderation and with a desire of investigating the truth, without injurious suspicions and mutual recriminations. For which purpose, let the agreement of minds be broken by temerity of controls, let all understand; that the integrity of the Catholic profession can by no means be reconciled with opinions approaching towards naturalism or rationalism, of which the sum total is to reject Christian institutions altogether, and to establish the supremacy of man, Almighty being pushed on one side.

LIKEWISE IT IS UNLAWFUL TO FOLLOW

one line of duty in private and another in public, so that the authority of the Church shall be observed in private, and spurned in public. For this would be to join together things honest and disgraceful, and to make a man fight a battle with himself, when on the contrary he ought always to be consistent with himself, and never in any the least thing in manner of living to decline from Christian virtue. But it ought to be made about principles merely political, concerning the best form of government, of civil regulations of one kind or another, established a standard of morality, of which consistency may weight the advantage of their neighbor, and to all others to the wisdom of Christ; heavily prepared to retire from public life, and even to die if they could not retain honesty, or the majesty of nor the supreme command with unalloyed virtue. For which reason Christian customs soon found their way, not only into private houses, but into the senate, into the camp, into the imperial palace. GOING THROUGH THE GATES.

BY ELEANOR C. DONNELLY.

(An incident attended on the departure from Philadelphia of a venerable and gifted Catholic priest, whose name is a household word among the readers of the Monitor.)

"May I go with him thro' the gates?"
—I asked the guard at railway station;
And when he answered, "Yes,"—at last,
Then manner-day, (gentle, and cold,)
With this, baby I found, I passed

"May I go with him thro' the Gates?"
—O God grant, one day, at heaven's portal,
I ask with wistful tenderness,—
And, if St. Peter answers, "Yes,"
Then joy, dear God, be blest, with the to prove Past golden Gates to false immortal!

SMALL BEGINNINGS.

BY CHARLES MACRAY.

A traveler through a dusty road strewed acorns on the inn;
And one took root and sprouted up, and grew into a tree.
Love sought the shade, at evening time, to breathe its early vows;
And age was pleased, in haste of noon, to bask beneath its boughs;
The dormouse loved its dangling twigs, the birds its covert made;
It stood a glory in its place, a blessing everywhere.

A little stream had lost its way amid the grass and fern,
A passing stranger scooped a well, where weary men might turn;
He walled it in, and hung with moss a cup that stood at the brink;
He thought not of the deed he did, but judged that God might think.

He passed again, and found the well, by summers worn and wet,
Still in use, the thousand parching tongues and weary feet
Served a life thereby.

A desert dropped a random thought, 'twas old and yet 'twas new
A simple fancy of the brain, but strong in being true.
It fell upon a gentle mind, and lo! its light grew broad
A lamp of life, a beacon ray, a monitory flame,
The thought was small, its issue great, a world-wide fame,
It slept in entrance for ashes, and chasm the valley still!

A nameless man, amid a crowd that thronged the daily mart,
Let fall a word of Hope and Love, unstolen from the heart;
A whisper on the breath thrown—a transitory breath—
It reached a brother from the dust; it saved a soul from death!

O ye! O Souls! O word of love! O thought! O ye
Ye were but little at the first, but mighty at the last.

Going Aloft.

How Captain Outlaw and his Companions Came to Take the Pledge.

One evening, a party of old shipmates met at a social supper. After the dishes were removed and the wine began to circulate freely, some of the older captains commenced spinning yarns about their own adventures at sea. Among the number was John Outlaw, who was a good sailor and a sailor as ever trod on deck. It was observed that he was drinking something well water; and when it came to his turn to enter into the conversation, it was thought he was rather shy.

Well, shipmates, to show you why I don't and can't drink with you, so that you may take my word as a sort of pledge, I will give you a chapter from my early sailor life. It is a very important chapter, too, for on the incident I am about to relate the whole of my subsequent behavior was built.

I was very young when I first went to sea. When I was eighteen I shipped on board an East Indiaman for a very long voyage. There were six of us on board of about the same age, and had shipped the same duties to perform. The ship, the Lady Dunlop, was a large one and our crew was large in proportion, there being fifty-two all told. Our captain was a noble-hearted, honorable man, kind and generous but very strict.

Now, we boys had learned in the course of our travels, to drink our grog as well as any sailor. When we used to get on shore we would invariably indulge in our cups, and not unfrequently would we come off in a state anything but sober. I said "we"—but there was one of our number who could not be induced to touch a drop of anything intoxicating. His name was John Small.

Now, Jack Small not only refrained entirely from drinking himself, but he used sometimes to ask us to let the stuff alone. He gave the job up, however, for we made sport of him that he was glad to be let alone. But our captain had sharp eyes, and it was not long before he began to notice Jack many favors which he did not show us.

He would often take him on shore with him to spend the night and such things as that, while we used to go on board the ship.

That wasn't all. He learned faster than we did—he was a better sailor, and he learned more navigation. It got so at length that Jack was placed upon the deck when the officers were off duty; and he used to work out the reckoning as soon as regularly as did the captain. Yet Jack was in our mess, and he was a constant companion! We saw that he was reaching rapidly ahead of us in every useful particular, and yet we wouldn't open our eyes. We were envious of his good fortune, as we called it, and used to seize every opportunity to make him feel that he never got angry at us in return. The world sometimes laugh at us, and at others he would so laughingly slide us that we would remain silent for a while.

At length the idea entered our heads that Jack should drink with us. We talked the matter over in the mess, when Jack was absent and we mutually pledged each other that we would make him drunk at the first opportunity. After this determination was taken, we treated Jack more kindly, and he was happier than he had been for some time. We were on our homeward bound passage, by way of Brazil and our ship stopped at Rio Janeiro, where we were to remain a week or so. One pleasant morning, we as passengers received permission to go on shore and spend the whole day; and accordingly we rigged up all our best togs and were carried to the landing.

Now was our chance and we put our heads together to see how matters should be done. Jack's first desire, as soon as we got on shore was to go up and examine the various things of interest in the city. He wanted to visit the churches and like places, and to please him we agreed to go with him if he would take dinner with us. He agreed to do this at once and we thought we had him sure. We planned that after dinner was eaten, we should have some light, sweet wine brought on, and that we would continue to get enough rum into it to make it drink to spare him; for nothing on earth would please us more than to get Jack drunk and carry him on board in that condition. Then we fancied the captain's favoritism would be at an end, and that he would no longer look upon our rival with more preference than upon ourselves.

Dinner came at length. It was a capital dinner and we came to it with sharpened appetites. But when the wine was brought in, Jack not only refused to taste it, but declined to remain in our company. We tried out against him as a mean, stingy fellow, who thought himself too good to associate with us and excused him at last of trying to step over our heads on the ship, and all the unpleasant things we could think of to make the poor fellow unhappy. At first, he seemed inclined to leave us and return to the ship alone; but suddenly in a quiet tone he said: "Shipmates, listen to me a moment. Since matters have come to this pass, I have resolved to tell you something which I never meant to reveal. My story is short. Since my earliest childhood I never knew what it was to have a happy home. My father was a drunkard! Once he was a good man and a good husband, but rum made a brute of him. I can remember how cold and shameless the winter used to be. We had no fire, no food, no clothes, no joy, no nothing—nothing but misery. Oh! how my mother prayed to God for her husband; and I, who could not prattle, learned to pray, too."

"When, I grew older, I had to go out and beg for bread. All cold and shivering I waded through the deep snow, with my shoeless tatters, and my freezing feet almost bare. And I saw other children of my age dressed warm and comfortable and I knew they were happy; for they laughed and sang as they bounded along to school. These boys had sober fathers. I knew that their fathers were no better than mine once, for my mother told me how noble my father could be if rum were not in his way.

"Time passed on and I was eight years old—and those eight years had been years of such sorrow and suffering, as I pray God I may never again experience. At length I caught a glory in its place, a blessing everywhere.

A little stream had lost its way amid the grass and fern,
A passing stranger scooped a well, where weary men might turn;
He walled it in, and hung with moss a cup that stood at the brink;
He thought not of the deed he did, but judged that God might think.

Editorial Notes.

The next British Parliament will contain 670 members, distributed as follows: England and Wales will return 486 members—393 for county divisions, 23 for borough divisions, and 5 for universities. Scotland will return 72 members—39 for counties, 31 for boroughs, and 2 for universities; Ireland will return 103 members—85 for counties, 16 for boroughs, and 2 for universities.

—As we go to press at noon after the feast of the Immaculate Conception, we give our readers—on the third page—the magnificent Pastoral Letter issued by Cardinal Wiseman in 1854, when the dogma was defined, so that many of our readers may know the sublime joy that filled the world at the time this glorious doctrine was publicly promulgated by the great Victor of Christ—Pius IX., of immortal memory.

—Parnell's tactics seem to have completely annihilated the Whig party in Ireland. The Whigs recently proved themselves the most oppressive enemies of Ireland in modern days, and the virulent foes of the Irish Parliamentary party. Parnell, however, seems to have become a second St. Patrick, as he has driven all the Whigs out of Irish politics—not one being returned to the next Parliament.

—The Encyclical Letter which we published last week is the fourteenth issued by the Sovereign Pontiff glorious Leo XIII. The noble renunciation by the Count de Mun of his projected organization of the Catholic party in order to avoid internal dissension, is looked upon as one of the first fruits of the Encyclical, and the Guerre Catholique of Milan, which has at times been somewhat unruly, admires the wisdom of the Pontiff, and promises for the future perfect conformity to his teachings.

—The pompous tomfoolery of secret societies is well illustrated by a notice in one of the Masonic dailies that "Most Temple, of the Ancient Arabic Order of Nobles of the Mystic Shrine, will meet for the purpose of accomplishing the ceremony of 'Habi Allah al Martin,' at which members are expected to wear the 'red fez.' And yet these are the very lunatics who would dare to scoff at the ritual and ceremonies of the Church of God, pregnant as they are with true and solemn meaning. We often find ourselves wondering how sane business men can waste their time with such overgrown babies.

—We sincerely hope that the appeal from the State officers of the Irish National League which we print on the fifth page, will have the effect of inducing all the friends of Ireland in California—who have not already donated—to send in their subscriptions for the Irish Parliamentary Fund. In Parnell's eyes is the interview which we publish elsewhere, "funds were never so urgently required as now," hence we hope that the large-hearted Catholics and their sympathizers will help Parnell to complete the grand victory for Ireland which he has already in a great measure achieved.

—What the brainworkers on English periodicals do not know about American affairs would make a book larger than the world itself. There's the Liverpool Catholic Times editorially assuring its readers that "Bishop England, of South Carolina, will, if God spares him, celebrate the hundredth anniversary of his birthday next year. The veteran Prelate was born in Cork in 1786." Now it is well known to that vast concourse of people designated as "the whole world," that Bishop England—God rest his soul—died in 1842, and we hope and pray that he may celebrate the centennial anniversary of his birth on earth by a glorious entry into heaven!

—Builders of foreign cathedrals, says the Catholic Review, who naturally undertake more than their own people can pay for, unjustly expecting that Catholic Americans will pay for them, ought to rest for a moment on the statement that St. Paul's Church in Brooklyn, N. Y., is now forty-nine years old, and it is only this month that it can exult in its freedom. This is the case in one of the most prosperous parishes in America. Another point to be remembered by American church builders is that in interest the principal has been paid two or three times over. We believe we are within the bounds of moderation, when we repeat, on the authority of one fairly familiar with the subject, that the Catholics of Brooklyn for example, could duplicate every year their most expensive church with the sums that they have to pay at January and July for interest! The most fatal expense that Catholic Americans have to meet is this same interest.

—The courage and kindness manifested by the Sisters of Charity in time of epidemics, have contributed greatly towards bringing converts into the Catholic Church. Here is an incident that happened recently in Canada: Some time ago a wealthy citizen, residing on Beaver Hall Hill, fell sick with the small pox. His children converted him to the upper story of the house and abandoned him. Nobody volunteered to take charge of him. The Grey Nuns learned of the affair, presented themselves at the house of the sick man, and asked permission to see him. After obtaining permission was to aid the sick of every religion. "As you wish," responded the servant, "and, if you do not fear the small-pox, you can go up stairs," and in accordance they did go. The Protestant gentleman was touched with the charitable conduct of the Sisters, and admired the religion which inspired them to make it a duty to assist him, and as his children had abandoned him, he asked that he might die a member of the Catholic Church. His condition being precarious, a priest was immediately brought into his presence. He was baptized, confessed and received Communion, and a few hours all rancorous parting been reconciled with the veritable Church. It is thus that God manifests his ardent love for those whose Catholic courage stamps them as the angels on earth of the God of Mercy in Heaven.

—We see by the dispatches that Phillip Callan has been beaten as member for Hardalls, by Mr. Nolan, a Parnellite. This news will be received with joy all over the world, as it removes from the Irish Parliamentary party a man whose chosen habit were a disgrace both to himself and to the Irish he represented. In his hate-breathing harangues from his hustings, when he learned his defeat, Mr. Callan charged Parnell with having "entered Parliament with his estates encumbered, while now they are free, and he has money in bank." This is true. A special fund was raised for the honest patriotic leader for the very purpose of releasing his property from debt, and if the sour and snubbed statesman who was defeated at Dundalk had behaved with more decency during his Parliamentary career, he too could have "money in bank" to-day. The time has gone by when the Irish cause can afford the disgrace of being represented in the Irish Parliament by men like Phil. Callan, who mix too much politics with their politics.

—The Public Schools of this city cost nearly a million dollars a year! From 1855 to 1883 they cost $7,336,428.56. Here is the condition of the buildings to-day as reported last week by the Committee on School Buildings selected from the Grand Jury: One school building they designated "not fit to shelter hogs," another was "a thirty-year old abomination," still another was "covered with green moss," while the next one visited "had not known a coat of paint for thirteen years. In some of the school houses basins, cups and similar vessels are used to catch the rain that drips through the badly-constructed roofs put on by contractors whose Public School education taught them how to realize the largest profits off the poorest work! And such is "the horrible condition" of the San Francisco Public Schools costing nearly a million dollars a year, out of the hard-earned taxes of the people! There must be a rare amount of speculation and pilfering among those who handle the funds, aside even from the bogus contracts, the "commissions" and the other phases of hidden robbery generally known to those who belong to "the inside ring" of Public School schemers.

The Encyclical Letter of the Sovereign Pontiff.

We sincerely hope that every reader of the MONITOR has already given the Encyclical Letter of Pope Leo XIII., which we published last week, the close and careful perusal which its supreme importance deserved. Beyond all question it is the most important Encyclical Letter issued since the Vatican. It contains valuable counsel for both the governing power and the masses governed; it teaches rulers their duty towards their people, and it instructs the multitude in the manner whereby they can best render unto God the things that are of God's and unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's.

Every Encyclical of the Vicar of Christ goes forth into the whole Christian world as the voice of God Himself, hence the moment one which are thus given to the faithful should be received with that respectful reverence which is due to the Supreme Pontiff who presides over the whole Christian Universe.

In a secular Encyclical there is food for reflection on the part of every Catholic citizen in America, when we recognize the fact that this country is rapidly drifting into that foul vortex of Infidelity, Communism, and immoral greatness which produces a nation's ruin. Luxury, lust and fabulous incomes are the sins of society that appear before the readers of the daily press in the Union. Had books and immoral papers with immodest pictures met the eye upon the counters and shelves of a vast majority of the book stores in America, Blasphemy is borne to the ears of the passer by upon every breeze that blows through every city every sin that cries to heaven for vengeance is perpetrated as common in this country as they were in Sodom and Gomorrah. Justice is inadequate to punish the full criminal, and political influence shields the indigent felon from the just vengeance of the law. And live, with a corrupting literature for the youth of the land; with schools where God is ignored and all the idol of every boy and girl—how sure is that Christian influence—without which (as the Encyclical says) no society can continue to exist, is born left for the rising generation!

And what manner of men are the adults of to-day? Are they honest, as virtuous, as truly Christian men and women as their progenitors? Have they that high sense of honor, that moral stamina, that virtuous of conduct which marked the citizens of their forefathers? Alas, no! "Pro nostra via diu perit," seems to comprise the world's decalogue of principles, and in order to accomplish this Alpha and Omega of modern life—dishonest men are taught nothing concerning God or man's duties to Him, or his responsibilities to his neighbor. Hence, when such children come to man's estate, they make as many as the sacrifice of every principle of that divine justice of which they are altogether ignorant, and of every natural virtuous instinct which they sneer at through ignorance, and worship the wealth and power in communities where vice is robed in purple and fine linen, while virtue wears the tattered garb of poverty most pleasing to God!

The public servants of the people, too, what of them? Does their character our respond with the Christian tenets laid down in the Encyclical? Are they honest, law-abiding citizens? Do they deserve praise for their official probity? Do they meet out justice equally to all men? Are they honest stewards in the sight of God? Here, again, we are compelled to say that—save with a very few remarkably rare exceptions—the political representatives of every party in power, are far from being prototypes of the just ruler typified in the Papal Encyclical.

But the most important portion of the able document before us, and the part that most interests Catholics in this country, is where reference is made by the Holy Father to the interest which all Catholic citizens should manifest in the management of the temporal affairs. The secular press, with its usual facility for propagating falsehood, has evidently misread the reading, but nevertheless, we feel that the present Pontiff is "opposed to the freedom of the press and to universal suffrage." The calumnies which can be easily deduced by misreading are manifest. Moreover, the secular press informed its readers that the Pope exhorted Catholics to take active part in elections and make themselves felt in political life. And then some writers who are as venal as they are serious—intimated, with their customary characteristic ignorance and blunder, upon this "new departure" as specially designed for the destruction of the American Republic!

What the Holy Father says upon this point is only a restoration of the rule always observed by Catholics. Here is so plain that no man—no matter how much anti-Catholic bigotry he may be imbued with—can mistake its meaning.

It is also of great importance to the public welfare (directly and wisely to give attention to the affairs of citizenship; in this regard now more than ever, the concerns which in right of Christ belong to Caesar, are so closely linked with those of God, that public provision must be made for the instruction of youth in religion and virtue; and this is the virtuous disposition very much the welfare of every State. Therefore, citizens in whom are lodged honorable trusts, the attention of Catholic men they and this earnestness of mind, which ought to be in every Christian conscience, ought to be in every public administration. Generally, we say, because that it may happen in some particular place, for the most important and just reasons, that it is by no means expedient to engage in public affairs, or to take part in the government of the State; generally, we have said, to wish it taken part in public affairs would be in that degree wrong, in which it would be wrong for Christian men not wish; and on this account the Catholics of Italy, who have so long by the salutary use of the doctrine which they profess, to do what has to be done with fidelity and with faith. If, on the contrary, they were lifeless, or whatever else to do in truth give any great hope of safety, would easily get possession of the reins of government. This also would be at ended with thanks to the Christian name, to the Church, to the Pontiff, and would be very advantageous to the Republic; and, on the contrary, if they were powerful who are well disposed, Whence lots it is evident there is just cause for Catholics to undertake the conduct of public affairs; for the duties of Christian Citizenship are such as to appear of what is not lawful in the methods of government at this time; but in order that they may turn these very methods, as far as may be, to the benefit of the Christian Republic, the purpose is their minds, to infuse into all the veins of government with the wholesome virtue of the Catholic religion the most healthy energy of Christian life. It is the sincerely desire of the Church to have regard for the laws, and to obey the rulers of the State. For the manners and doctrine of the Church are such as to appear widely so apart from the manners and doctrine of the Gospel; for the Christian to be accused of disobedience amounts in the idea of superstition, and, always true to their duties, to be most faithful to order every will to life which was open to them. Models of fidelity to their princes, Christians, who, loyal to the sovereign power, they established a wonderful Empire, Made of Barbarians, they made the advantage of their neighbor, and of all others to the whole world. Others bravely prepared to relieve from public life, and true to the if they were forced to endure the most grievous and most undeserved punishments. Such are the Christians, for which Christian customs soon found the way, not only into private houses, but into the camps, into the senate, even into the imperial palaces.

In the foregoing extract from the Encyclical the Sovereign Pontiff particularly alludes to the lamentable lethargy which has hitherto overwhelmed the Catholics of France and Italy, who have refrained from active participation in the political contests in their native countries, and the result has been that the Church has been ridden over roughshod by a cabal of Freemasons and infidels. The same catastrophe for this interest of the Church and the cause of good government, could happen in any land if Catholics permitted the politics of the country to be manipulated by miscreants whose only aim in life seems to be to belch Blasphemy at God and to curse the Catholic Church with the anathema of their diabolical hate. Such men exist in every community. In America, just as in France and Italy, there are enemies of the Church, who are prominent in politics and who only want the opportunity in order to play the role of the Italian Garibaldi or the French Freemason in this land of free press, free speech and free religion.

For this reason it behooves the Catholic citizens of every land—where such a course is found necessary—to actively participate in political affairs so that the vile enemies of God and religion may not secure political supremacy and their try to destroy both.

The Church neither makes political platforms nor manipulates political caucuses. Her mission is far higher and holier. She is "the light which enlightenth all men," and here is the voice which warns the white Christian world concerning the shoals of sectarianism and the political pitfalls to which Christians are surrounded in their journey through life. What may appear fair and honest to the unsuspecting individual Catholic man or woman, may be the latest device of the devil's deputies for the destruction of Christianity and the persecution of the Church. She, the ever watchful Mother, is like "a city set on a hill," where all nations can see her, and where her ensign can penetrate into the precincts of all the political abysses of piety as well as into the dark purlieus of politics. And when her Argus eye discerns anything, which is either the spiritual or the temporal sphere, the voice of the Vicar of Christ is heard above the daily din of the world, warning the flock of Christ against impiety of devotion or admonishing them to avoid the political snares in sheep's clothing, who are preparing to destroy the lambs and sheep Christ left to His vicar's care.

It is for this purpose that Encyclical Letters are written, and we as Catholics who look upon the Pope as our guiding light to God—should treasure up in our souls every sentiment he sends forth, so as to make his ideas the daily rule of our lives. Just as the Holy Father is responsible to God for the safety of the bark of Peter when under his control, so are we responsible to God if we what with neglect or contumely the words of admonition, counsel or reproof which the Pope places before us in order to make the conduct of each Catholic in the world more consonant with the faith, the hope and the charity of that Christianity which our Blessed Lord established—and which he left to His Church to propagate and perpetuate for ever and ever.

OUR BOOK TABLE.

THE MONTH OF DECEMBER, dedicated to the Holy Infant Jesus, by Father Lambert, S. J. Price, with frontispiece, 75 cents. Cincinnati: Benziger Bros. For sale by Cunnion and Co. Blessed is Marcia, with an Epitaph on such as Her Mistress, and on such as Her Spouse of Jesus. Translated from the French by the Rev. Thomas Hunt, D. D. London: Burns and Oates. Publisher. John Murphy & Publication Blessed 1885.

This delightful and instructive book is the result of the labors of a Catholic gentleman who has been spending several months in Ireland in order to secure physical recuperation, through the strengthening influence of the nation air. Every loom and square account that might other wise have been spent in mere pastime or in idle pleasure, was generously given to the task of compiling the information contained in this labor. Father Kenny has accomplished a vast amount of good both for the cause of Religion as well as for the bounds of Catholic literature.

The cause which led Father Kenny to undertake this work, and the great worth of the book itself, are so well stated by the translator in his preface, that we cannot do better than quote it:

Whilst travelling in France, I fortunately received from a very learned and holy religious the work of which the following is a translation. I had long been in search of such a work, so bounded at the deep and veiled theological and ascetical meaning of the Holy Scriptures, and real sense. I frequently felt weakness of memory for the Holy Scriptures, and I felt the want of a work which would at once satisfy my religious sentiments inside on almost every page of this sacred and inspired book. Hence I felt, I enjoyed the blessed gift of God to the public in an English dress, I felt that it would be a great consolation and edification to my fellow-Catholics, and which would be a great consolation and edification to my fellow-Catholics, and which would be of great service to them, if they would be of great service to them, if they would be of great service to them, if they

Farm and Home.

Mischief Played by Mortgages.

The following is from a San Joaquin farmer, in the Lodi Sentinel. It is good reading for other people as well as farmers:

I have lived in this locality for twenty-one years. During that time I have farmed from 160 to 320 acres of splendid land, within seven miles of Lodi. When I came to this country I pre-empted a quarter section. Twelve years ago I bought the adjoining quarter section, paying for the whole for $10,000 to enable me to buy it. Out of my twelve years' farming I have supported my family, fenced my lands, built a good barn and stable, and paid $2,500 on my house, which I built five years ago at a cost of $6,000. I raised $2,700, balance on the house, on a joint note which a neighbor helped me to make. This is about what I have accomplished. It is an honest confession. Some have done better—many have failed to do as well. On the $10,000 mortgage I have paid 8 per cent to a Stockton bank for the past eleven years. I was figuring up what this "plater" has cost me in that time. Just think of it. I have paid $66 65 interest per month on that confounded, blood-sucking mortgage. Adding the compounded interest, I have paid $9,000 interest for my foolishness in going in debt to buy that quarter section. The $2,700 I owe on the joint note has cost me in interest in the last four years at 10 per cent, just exactly $1,580, counting the broker's commission. For the glory of owning 320 acres of land and for the comfort of living in a fine house, I have paid $10,000 interest, and still I owe $12,700. I tell you, Mr. Editor, mortgages knock out more farmers financially than short crops and hog cholera. I am 57 years old; gray hairs and fewer of them round me than I am sliding down life's decline. If I am not old enough to learn wisdom I must always remain a blank fool. I am tired of this big ranch of mine, with its big debt, its big expenses and its small net profits. I'm tired of slaving for kid-gloved money lenders. One half of my time is for them. I am going to rent out, and will sell 160 acres of as good land as there is in the valley, all well fenced, and with other valuable improvements, for just the amount of my debts. Anybody who will release me of two damnable, iron-clad, double-twisted promissory notes, together amounting to $12,700, can take that quarter section. I'm in dead earnest. With 160 acres free of debt, I could take hold, even in old age, with the courage of youth, and enjoy the remainder of life with some satisfaction. If I succeed in selling to parties now negotiating with me, I shall sow this winter 100 acres of deep plowed fall wheat; 10 acres I shall plant to alfalfa, which I shall irrigate through summer by windmills or horse-power; 10 acres then I shall put to French prunes and Bartlett pears, and another 10 acres I think I shall set out in raisin grapes. The other thirty acres I may plant to melons, corn or barley. I shall tell all of my pecan grafts of hogs and other stock, and with only parent breeds I think I can make the fewer hands stock of increased profit to me. I am satisfied that we farmers have in a measure been wearing our energies and opportunities for many years past, and for one I am determined to abandon "speculative agriculture," the success of which depends on the combined action of such a big wheat crop and a high wheat market.

Profit in Alfalfa.

Alfalfa has long been recognized as one of the most profitable crops grown in California, but until the present season even many of those engaged in the growing of this forage plant did not know what could be realized per acre on their crops. Several of our farmers have kept accurate account of their expenses, and several of these have already been reported in the Reporter. This week we add another item in this matter. G. Wray pastured thirteen head of cows for three months upon thirteen acres of alfalfa this year. Then he took the cows off and allowed the alfalfa to grow for hay. He got 26 tons of hay from the 13 acres, worth $4 per ton on the ground. Then he permitted the alfalfa to go to seed, and has just sold this crop. The 13 acres yielded 11 508 pounds of seed, which was sold for 8994 64, and 13 tons of stalks were $5 per ton. The total expense of cutting hay and seed alfalfa and threshing, hauling, etc., amounted to $726 76, and the income was 26 tons of hay at $4, $104; 11,508 pounds of seed, at $6 60 per 100, $994 64; 13 tons of stalks, at $5, $65; throw mouths' pasturage, 13 head at $1 50 per head per month, $58 50; total, $1,157 14; leaving a net income from the 13 acres of $429 64. This is an average of $32 15 net for each of the 13 acres.—Tulare Reporter.

Things to Do and to Know.

Don't breed from a vicious bull.

There will be an immense corn crop this year. It will amount to 1,377,529,000 bushels.

Feed hogs and eat at home, and use up the products of the farm on the farm. Give back to the soil what it gives to you.

I have handled upon three large farms four distinctive classes of farm labor, and most unequivocally indorse the educated farm laborer.—Professor Sanborn.

Mr. Christopher Rheney, of Tacharton, Pa., has produced a new peach, which he names the Globe. It is a large, handsome and luscious fruit, and Mr. Rheney has a right to be proud of it.

If a boy has not a natural liking for domestic animals—does not like to feed, handle and pet them—he will never be fit for a successful farmer. Let him go to some other business, either doctor, lawyer or highwayman.

F. Houghton, of Corning, Tehama county, Cal., will soon have probably the largest poultry farm in the world. He has nearly 5,000 hens, and he has two houses built on sleds, so that he can move them from place to place on his wheat stubble.

An Extraordinary Funeral.

There have been few interments of a more singular character than that of a Lousiana man named William Harrison, aged 82 years. The deceased was a retired butcher and horse-dealer at Chorley, and for many years past has been most eccentric, as may be seen from the provision of his will: "That my coffin be made of oak and furnished with brass handles and plate, but no black or my crooked stick to be put in my coffin before my right hand . . . that the horse shall have glass sides, but no feathers or plumes, and to be drawn by four gray horses; that no mourning coaches be allowed to follow, but shandrins and carts may be used; that neither sons nor daughters, nor any relative nor friends, do follow me to the grave in black clothes; that my relations and friends, immediately after the funeral, must get something to eat and drink at Blackrod; that £10 of assets be given to the children of Blackrod; that when my relatives and friends who have attended the funeral have arrived at their by all most have as much refreshment as they can eat and drink; and that £20 of assets be given to the grandchildren at Chorley." These instructions were generally carried out to the letter, and great excitement was occasioned at Chorley and Blackrod—thousands of people lining the roads. Upwards of thirty carts with gray or bay horses followed the hearse, and refreshments at Blackrod and Chorley were dispensed so liberally.

Family Fun.

A New Delicacy.

"We are goin' to have a pie for dinner," said Hobby to the minister.

"Indeed!" laughed the dominie, amused at the little boy's artlessness; "and what kind of pie, Hobby?"

"It's a new kind. Ma was talkin' this mornin' should pa bringin' you to dinner so often, and pa said he didn't care what she thought, and one said she'd make him eat humble pie the first time he came, so I s'pose we're goin' to have it for dinner."

Is this a Sign of Correctness?

"There has been a revival in our town."

"Many people converted?"

"Oh, yes, and among them twenty pupils of the Female College.

"How do you know they are converted?

"Because they have declared their determination to flirt with none but divinity students hereafter."

Why they Die.

"Mamma," he said, "what makes people die, say why?"

"Everybody's got to die," said mamma, in the usual evasive way in which people answer children's questions.

"Of course I know people, what does he mean by making them die?"

"My child, you forget that people must die to make room for the children that are always being born. There would be no room for the new people if nobody died.

"That's so," said the little fellow contemplatively—"and there's so many dogs."

Spontaneous Combustion.

Some one has estimated that the time thrown away in this world in courting the girl you want to marry, and who is ready to marry you, would build all the railroads and bridges and tunnels and factories and public buildings. The white race should take a lesson in this from the colored people. The other day a likely young colored woman came along with a dog.

"Hit, dat?" he called, "but mebbe you want to sell dat dog?"

"Yes, sah."

"Mebbe your name is Lucinda?"

"Yes, sah."

"I allers dole on dat name. Its called Gumpy."

"Dat's pleasin'."

"Yes lookin', you know?"

"Yes."

"Got money saved up, an' a stidy job ahead. Shall I speak to de ole man?"

"He's in Orleans."

"Den I'll see de ole woman."

"She's dead."

"Well, den I'll ax you to be my wife right now."

"You's foolin'."

"Deed, no."

"Hain't got nobody else?"

"Nobody, 'tall."

"Reckon we'll hitch?"

"You's as will—can't help it."

"Well, den, I'll say you, an' to night you come down to Mrs. Grumley's kitchen an' we'll do de ole an' new git sequainted."

"Lookeda,—"

"Go long, Gumpy! Im dun said yes, an' dat's end. Doma sirly."

"So long, Cinda!"

"Ily-by, Gumpy!"

The New Baby.

Julia (aged six)—"We've got a new baby at our house.

Clara (aged six)—"What is it, a boy or a girl?"

Julia—"Oh, we don't know yet. We've only had it two days."

Complained of Feeling Tired.

Farmer (to physician)—If you get out my way, doctor, any time, I wish you'd stop and see my wife. She says she can't feel well. Physician—What are some of her symptoms? Farmer—Well, sometimes, after she had milked the cows, and fed the stock, an' got breakfast for the hands, an' washed the dishes, an' built a fire under the soft-soap kettle in the lime, an' done a few other best things she has complained o' feelin' kinder tired. I shouldn't be surprised if her blood was out of order. I guess she needs a dose of medicine.

They were not Man and Wife.

"There are some queer couples in this world," remarked a Dearborn Street real estate agent. "The other day a man and woman called to see about renting a flat on the North Side. The women did all the talking, and turned to the men for confirmation or corroboration. He always agreed with her, and he did it very meekly.

"'Well,' said the woman finally, 'I'll give you $25 for the flat, won't we, John?'

"'Yes,' replied the man.

"'And I'll pay my rent promptly, too, won't we, John?'

"'Yes.'

"'And I'll take good care of the house, won't I, John?'

"'Yes, I inquired, as in duty in such cases, are you man and wife?'

"'Man and wife?' exclaimed the woman, sharply; 'indeed we are not, are we, John?'

"'No,'

"'What? says I, 'not man and wife?'

"'Not much. I'd have you know that in this family we are wife and man, ain't we, John?'

"'Yes,'"

The Pire Tongs Like the Dude.

The dude was raising a clearing young society lady, and as they sat on either side of an open grate fire his heart was full of a burning desire to say something complimentary. So, after revolving the matter in his mind during a two minute's burst of silence, he said:

"Ah, Miss Lillie, why are those firetongs so like me?" [He meant to give him to tell her "because they glowed in her service," or even "prostrate at her feet," or something of that kind.]

Miss Lillie looked so solemnly demure that the clock stopped; and she didn't know unless it was because they had two this hoop and a bone bonel. He was groping blindly for the front door before she had recovered from the shock of her own volley.

THE WEEK'S NEWS
—FROM—IRELAND.

IRISH NEWS BY MAIL.

Armagh.—The election address of Mr. Cardwell, Parliament is out. He asks for his election as the "independent electors" of Mid-Armagh, and states that he has no connection. He says: "the laborer is fairly entitled to one acre of land at least, with a comfortable house at a fair rent. Workingmen in towns or villages should have gardens allotted to them, at a fair rent, in some convenient ground to be purchased by the Government." Mr. Cardwell is a Protestant farmer. He declares himself against separation.

Clare.—The tenants on the various estates in Kilkrant, purpose establishing a Defence Association to fight the landlords who refuse to accede to their demands for a reduction. Tenants are to be accorded to valuation, and a treasurer and secretary will be appointed to act after the interests of the association.

Mr. Theobald Bailey, of Ballyline House, Crusheen, was asked by his tenantry for an abatement of their rents, which he responded by connecting a present valuation of 25 per cent, reducing the rent as a rental of £4,000 per annum, to £1,000, and this, too, in the face of the fact that his father, the late Colonel Butler, C. L. had before his demise reduced the rents to the Government valuation.

Cork.—On October 7th, in the land Judicial Court, Judge Flanagan and Judge Flanagan granted reductions of 20 per cent. 30 per cent. and 40 per cent. on estates in the County Cork, Mr. Healy, M. P., appeared for the applicants.

Mr. Deasy, M. P., intends to sit for Mayo, and there is a strong effort will be made in the representation of Cork. Some gentlemen have been named in connection with the seat, but it is supposed that Mr. Maurice Healy will be the selected candidate.

The furniture warehouse of Messrs. Hodges & Son, Cork, was completely destroyed by fire, on Nov. 7th. The damage done is estimated at between £7,000 and £8,000.

Mr Jeremiah Hegarty, of Ballincrossa, died on Nov. 7th. He was a prominent part in the Parnell movement and was promoted to the rank of "Centre" at a very early stage, and whilst Dunkieran, Keane, and Colonel O'Mahony were busily engaged in organizing, Jerry Hegarty, in whom was placed implicit confidence, was never absent from his post of danger. He was generally respected, and his funeral was attended by a vast number of people of all classes and creeds.

Carlow.—A contest has burst in the County Carlow which cannot be regarded without concern. Lord Rathdonnell has thrown down the gauntlet defiance to his tenants and the interest of tenants. He notifies his tenants that he is unaffected by the fall in prices of produce or the action of other landlords, and that he can have what is in the bond he means what he means to enforce. If the tenants are on of their claim the matter, it is in the mockery of their claim. They not so prepare for contest. Considering the well on the judicial rents. Considering the well known character of the workers, this demand is certainly tender.

Donegal.—During the last few weeks there has been a considerable influx of herrings into Donegal Bay, and just as many of the poor fishermen round the shore were availing of this rich harvest of the sea, a violent storm arose on the 20th of October, and did an enormous deal of mischief to the poor man's nets. They make the most reliable appeals for assistance to enable one nets to be procured that they may make a livelihood while the herrings remain. The poor people are enable to replace the nets they have lost. They are now idle and consequently are a means of relieving the very worst of poverty and distress. Now is the time, when they wishes their return, and when they stand most in need of it, a bad winter coming on.

Sligo.—The proprietors of the Newry Foundry have received an order from Mr. Chas. Barnard Bell, R. E., for an steamer, to be brought from road for one of the bailiffs on his estates in Sandstone, County Wicklow.

At the first annual meeting of the shareholders of the Ballina Factory Company, held on Nov. 12, in the offices, Ballina, that the net profit for the year amounted to £1,100 (£1,100 £1,100) the past year was the forward the year the surplus profits. The work is now in good repair, and the prospect is particularly encouraging. The report was unanimously adopted.

Dublin.—The beautiful statue in Carrara marble of Thomas Davis by John Hogan is generally considered to be the most perfect work of art in Dublin. A black corner of Mount Jerome Cemetery, Dublin. That noble piece of sculpture was intended to perpetuate the lineaments of an incomparable patriot, in a complete and close resemblance to the taste of a sculptor, the sympathetic, and a person in a cultivated regard. The cemetery committee, who, whatever else we may be accused of, have not been very patriotic, say it is "quite" [illegible] Dublin's admirers, and, if we mistake not, the calling of Davis's fame, to some convenient ground to be purchased by the Government." Mr. Cardwell is a Protestant farmer. He declares himself against separation.

Clare.—The tenants on the various estates in Kilkrant, purpose establishing a Defence Association to fight the landlords who refuse to accede to their demands for a reduction. Tenants are to be accorded to valuation, and a treasurer and secretary will be appointed to act after the interests of the association.

Mr. Theobald Bailey, of Ballyline House, Crusheen, was asked by his tenantry for an abatement of their rents, which he responded by connecting a present valuation of 25 per cent, reducing the rent as a rental of £4,000 per annum, to £1,000, and this, too, in the face of the fact that his father, the late Colonel Butler, C. L. had before his demise reduced the rents to the Government valuation.

Armagh.—The election address of Mr. Cardwell, Parliament is out. He asks for his election as the "independent electors" of Mid-Armagh, and states that he has no connection. He says: "the laborer is fairly entitled to one acre of land at least, with a comfortable house at a fair rent. Workingmen in towns or villages should have gardens allotted to them, at a fair rent, in some convenient ground to be purchased by the Government." Mr. Cardwell is a Protestant farmer. THE SOGGARTH SLAIN AT THE MIDNIGHT MASS.

A Christmas Story of Ireland's Penal Days.

WRITTEN FOR THE MONITOR BY "DENDRY."

CHAPTER I.

IRISH IDLES—HORSEMEN AND HOUND.

"So you are going to spend the Christmas in dear old Ireland, and amid the sadly changed scenes of your youth, said a young officer of the Irish Brigade in the service of France, Captain O'Sullivan, to whom these words were addressed, to Mr. Hugh Blake, a civilian waiting for some one who wished to accompany him on board the ship Marie Antoinette, a beautiful lugger, then riding at anchor in one of the Atlantic Madagascan ports, "I leave for a while the gaiety of France for the sympathy of Ireland. I long to see the breakers from my native Irish cliffs that guard the coast of Hearn, and to hear the purple road of the mountain torrents by which in childhood I was so often lulled to rest. I speak of the lands of the heroic, the ceremony and pomp of courts, and I hope for great results from a few weeks rest and retirement at home. Besides, by contemplating the past in the ruin which this "Reformation" has wrought over there, I shall be more disposed to make provision for the future—a work very difficult of performance amid the levity of the march."

"But," said Lieutenant Macwesney, "my father writes saying there is not a priest in the whole Barony of Ikeara at present."

"We have provided for that," replied O'Sullivan. "Father O'Driscoll is to accompany us, and he will bring tidings of great joy to the hearts of that faithful and afflicted people. Here both he and young Clonoulty of Clare's regiment come."

Father O'Driscoll, having bade farewell to lieutenant Macwesney, descended to the boat, and the latter shouted "Ho, Irish," as the seamen bent to their oars, and the pennace shot to the brigantine in the offing.

Captain O'Sullivan, destined by his pious parents for the Church, was sent to the celebrated university of Salamanca when yet a boy, where he had for Professor a Philosophy the good padre who was now to be his companion on a voyage to Erin. The penetrating minds of his gaoloaus in the great Spanish school soon discovered that Michael, the young Irish lad, had no extreme vocation to be one of those of whom St. Ignatius, his tutor, said, "Give me a permanent lad. With a well-formed, fine physique he possessed a handsome face, bearing upon them the impress of holiness, often the oracle to Padre Patricio remarked that the mind of this mercury and wire encum Monster boy was of "no ordinary calibre. He belonged to a military family, however, and is more likely to follow the footsteps of his father than follow in his kinsman, Philip the Historian. I verily believe that a bullet would rest easier in the breast of Michael, as the Spaniards reverently called him, than a monkish cowl. Mark my words, he will be a soldier, and a soldier of the Church, where stood the an entirety of Lady Mitchelstown, the Marquis of Ely, the owner of a smuggling brigantine called the Marie Antoinette, then engaged in the Spanish wine trade, and plying between Cadiz and Malaga, and Lisbon, and Oporto, and Madeira. Having duly completed the curriculum of his studies, he returned to his native Salamanca where his countrymen were both numerous and influential, and for a few days. Here, as in La Rabida, the brilliant and gifted young Irish Jesuits were treated with the utmost respect, and they entered the lists against the intellectual giants of the university, and came a time home off the palm of victory.

In the Spanish Jesuits he found a sympathy invariably demonished the failures of his own countrymen, and he was often used to advantage. His body, in the prime of youth, was lithe and nimble, while the grace of his carriage and deportment bespoke a gentleman accustomed to be in high place. Courteous and winning, had an expression of unmistakable sadness, which, when he chose, gave his whole countenance a most pleasing and attractive charm.

These qualities of mind and body, however, were not necessary to recommend him to the people. Enough for them that he was a priest—hasten admitted. With the eye of faith they saw, in his mind, the rays of Faith, and strain the shall ensure the "invisible" Hand, the young prince of peace, of him that showeth forth good, and publisheth salvation, and saith unto Sion, Thy God shall reign." No people ever loved more than the Irish, with such an ardent and unchanging love as the Celts. They have looked upon them as the "ambassadors of God and the dispensers of his mercy. Truly did and do they regard the priesthood, as the "Ministers of the Fast, "as ministers of Christ, and dispensers of the mysteries of God."

Having reached the Clan na Ikeara House and entertained with a princely feast Ikeara, twenty miles south of the mouth of the Shannon river, Father Patrick rested and refreshed himself. Early on the second morning, he and Captain Mortimer set out on their long home in Ireland. Ikeara, Malfoba, Thirty journey was mostly along the sea shore, through country as varied and diverse in its natural aspects as in its whole form in the breasts of these patriots sentiments of sadness and feelings of admiration, awe and sublimity. Ruined hamlets met them on every side.

"The hand of the despoiler has been here," said the Captain, as they passed Ikeara. Padre, "Yes," returned the captain, "the ability of Hearn are numerous and honors on the Continent, and the people are proud of their revolution, become an easy prey to the plunderers."

"There are few very rich and cultivated farms in this once happy hamlet, Mortimer," continued the gentle priest, as he turned away his face to hide the tears that glistened on his cheek. Here were scenes of peace and happiness, and of a rural kind. Memories of the past came flooding into the Jesuit's heart, and he groaned aloud. "Ah, Mortimer, I have seen this spot, and for a long time his sunshine and joy, and the sweet contentment of robes in silence till they reached the summit of Cnoc Ikeara which overlooks Tobir Malfoba. Here they dismounted, picketed their horses, and sat down to contemplate the beautiful panorama that stretched far and wide beneath them. Time might easily perceive, by the twinkling of O'Sullivan's features, that powerful emotions were struggling in his breast. "I land so fair, and yet so oppressed! Ubar Dublaig, she is a country worth dying for." were the only words that escaped

LUCKY GULCH.

Christmas Story of the Days of '49.

CHAPTER I.

A SCENE IN LUCKY GULCH.

It was matched California from the Pacific Ocean to the Sierras. I doubt very much if a more picturesque mining camp could have been found then or since. It was a long, narrow, winding prospectors called "Lucky Gulch." The ground of which I write was the winter of '49, at which time many rich strikes were made, and many fortunes were won from the virgin soil of the land of gold. The "Lucky Gulchites" boasted of having a Justice of the Peace, five saloons, a hotel, some hundred and odd cabins and a general store at which they purchased the greater part of their provisions. Besides all these outfitting accessories as peculiarly worthy of the honest pride of the camp, the town boasted of having a lone, unprotected (save by them) woman in their midst. She was a widow with two children, and lived a short distance from the hotel. Her husband had been killed two years before in a shaft, and she was left to care for the little managed to earn a livelihood by washing for the miners. When a new comer arrived in the Gulch, and succeeded in the business of remaining, he was immediately shown to the widow's home and sentiuously instructed as to how his washing there "to help the widder an' her young uns." Ned Foote, the largest mine owner and the representative man of the place, had a particular tenderness and rude benevolence would express himself.

It was a cold, wet night in the beginning of November, and many of the miners were congregated in the bar room of the hotel. They were seated around the stove, which was red with excessive heat, and the genial Miller, after whom the hotel was named, was behind the bar, with cheerful face behind the bar. Recounting thrilling adventures of mining life and danger was Miller's chief and most popular way the order of business for the evening. Pete Burnett, the champion tale teller of the crowd, had just finished a yarn which had by for the most improbable demonstration of any he had yet related—and they were not few. In fact it must have been pretty hard to "swallow" for the majority of the auditors, following Pete's yarn, with a "nightcap" for another "whisky hot" undoubtedly to help down Pete's latest achievement, for, as a rule, they had been accused of having a partiality for "fancy" drinks except when Burnett was the furnisher of the night's amusement. After a violent cough, with an accompanying sigh by the miner who noisily kept time with their feet, Ned Price who was a new comer, having arrived the day before, was called upon to add to the diversions.

He arose from the corner of the room in which he had quietly been sitting during the evening, and, after filling his pipe, passed, and ordering the dignified Miller to replenish his glass, he said in a low tone of voice: "Boys! I'm a stranger here, here'n' 'river' mining is new to me, but I'm the most unlucky one yer ever laid yer organs of vision on 'ter.' I'm a sailor, yer see, 'on the Gulch' sailor, an' den dat's what yous tern up an' beat all my hopes. Yes I name here, I bunged up all my 'open company' an' the very night I made my bow to Lucky, 'on the sea' I spoke blessed old shell up in which we was playin' an' she blew! up by a man who was carrying nearly powder. All the talent cum mighty near ter bein' scattered 'on' Price finished this sentiment with a sigh, and he looked ruefully "pull" at his whisky and sentiment.

"It was jer the same, when I cum near gettin' a fortune! My luck turned deed jest as I was about beartying a gal, he continued: "I'm the most unlucky fellow yer might ever meet. I'm so unfortunately lucky that I'm ruined! Yes, I'm ruined! I'm ruined! I'm ruined!" Ned Price paused in silence had his auditors allowed him, for, as a rule, they were in the humor to listen to his exploits and accordingly were loud in their praise of his alleged luck when he had lost the fortune he mentioned.

"The best partner I had, I'm the cost of yer story Ned, as yer might as well tell 'em," said Jerry Higgins, the janitor of the Peace, "an' perhaps I can help yer long with a little advice afterwards."

Ned finished his drink and calling for another settled himself comfortably in his chair and began "Jer the fire in it to recall the thoughts he began: "I'm a native of Boston, Massachusetts, as Hollow Gulch, Indian or more up north'ard, an' I'm the only child of a fether and Sukkes—jer yer heard tell of him, Jerry? Well, he's a fortkiaat' the many Boston. Well, I left all my fether an' mether an' sister

THE WEEK.

Notes.

IRELAND is the region of Christ and souls were massacred during Reconciliation. Many of these were sisters.

Our readers will appreciate the joy with which we make the announcement that Bro. McCrary has placed himself under the total abstinence banner! The Mártyrs, therefore, in doing good even in the Methodist camp, and this reformation on the part of our evangelical brother proves the truth of the dictich which tells us that

> As long as the lamp holds out to burn,
> The vilest sinner may return!

—Herr Windthorst, the well known leader of the Central party of the German Reichstag, intends taking a very important part in the coming Catholic Congress to be held at Munster. Inter alia, he means to propose the foundation of an international league of the Catholics of the whole world for the defense of the interests of the Holy See and the Catholic Church. Such a project has, it is rumored, been put before the Holy Father, and has met with favorable consideration.

—An Eastern telegram conveys the cheering news that the Irish National League proposes to pay a stated salary of $1,500 to Parnell and the eighty-three Nationalists recently elected to the British Parliament. It is justly claimed that Ireland's representatives should live like gentlemen and be entirely independent of England or her gold. This is a step in the right direction, and it will be productive of nothing up a party that neither bribery can buy nor English office tempt to turn traitors to their long suffering country.

—An interesting trial is going on in Belgium. After the Nuns had been expelled from an orphanage at Mons by Masonic influence, a certain Eulalia Hanoy was placed in charge of the establishment. Lately serious charges were made against her. She was accused of pilfering, of appropriating the moneys of the institution, of making false balance sheets, and of robbing one of the orphans, and she was found guilty. She has appealed to a higher court. The Freemasons are in great consternation, and are doing all they can to hush the matter up.

—Rev. J. B. Coitor, who was recently commissioned by the Catholic Total Abstinence Union to lecture on Temperance all over the United States, seems to be accomplishing a great deal of good wherever he plends the cause of sobriety. At Columbus, Ohio, 500 people followed the example of Bishop Watterson and Father Fitzgerald in taking the pledge. Secretary Egan of Indiana writes that Father Coitor's tour through Indiana has been a perfect success. He spoke at Notre Dame, South Bend, Anderson, Indianapolis and Richmond. In Richmond 300 received the pledge, and two societies will be organized there, and new societies will be formed in other parts of the State. There are at least two thousand men, women and children in this city who would be better off if they could be induced to follow Father Coitor's advice.

—The news from Ireland which the MONITOR carries to its readers this week concerning the splendid National victories gained at the recent elections throughout Great Britain and Ireland, will make the coming Christmas one of the most joyful the friends of Ireland have known during the present century. On the eighth page will be found election returns from Leinster, Munster, Connaught and Ulster which will explain all who read aright the majestic renewal of life and vigor which has come upon the people at his possession to the rights of that Christian nation, Ireland, being an hymn of the Redeemer, when enjoyment, will and forgets as give three cheers for Parnell and the Irish parliamentary party.

—When Santa Claus visits us as the MONITOR's mail carrier this week, he will have to travel almost complete by around the world in order to convey the Christmas MONITOR to the four quarters of the globe. After distributing thousands of copies throughout every county in this State, he will distribute a large number of MONITORS throughout Oregon and Washington Territory. Thence he will travel through British Columbia and up to the snow regions of Alaska. He will return down the coast to Vancouver Island and from thence voyage to the Sandwich Islands, thence to China, thence down to Australia, cross over to New Zealand, and then take steamer for Europe. After delivering his big bundle of MONITORS in every county in Ireland, he will drop a few in England, thence go to Brussels, Louvain, and on to Rome. Returning to Paris he will embark for New Orleans, thence distribute copies in Louisiana, Tennessee, Kentucky, Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Massachusetts and New York. Starting again, he will distribute MONITORS in New Jersey, Connecticut, Vermont, Rhode Island and Massachusetts. Thence he will travel on his sled up into Michigan and Canada, returning through Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, Dakota, Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, Arizona, Utah, Idaho, Nevada, and thence to his home on the snow clad summit of the Sierras. May the Christmas MONITOR forwarded by friends on the Pacific coast be a welcome visitor at all who are in every land mentioned, and may it help to make in every home it reaches the joyous festival of Christmas more enjoyable, and add to the happiness and spiritual profit of all who peruse its well filled pages.

—Rev. F. F. Quigley, D. D., Professor of Sacred Scripture at St. Mary's Seminary, Cleveland, has been appointed Pastor of St. Peter's Church, Toledo, O., made vacant by the death of the late Father O'Reilly.

Gifts for Almighty God!

In every city, town, hamlet and village throughout the whole civilized world today, the marts of commerce that line the principal thoroughfares are filled with Christmas gifts to suit the taste of rich and poor, young and old—of all conditions in life. The cradled infant, the growing child, the budding youth, the matured man, the matronly woman, yes, even the enfeebled veteran with one foot already on the threshold of eternity—all have Christmas gifts allotted to them as joyous memento of man's universal jubilee in honor of the birth day of the Redeemer of the world!

There are gifts for this young and gifts for the old, gifts for the learned and gifts for the civil! Not all is for sale! Tis the story of old Five are kind of a present for God!

Yes, reflecting Catholic! The very author and originator of Christmas is forgotten by fallen man in the intoxication of delight which surrounds what he universally calls "Merry Christmas!" What is it that gives Christmas its greatest joy? It is the fact that God founded this festival and that He gave His only Son as His first and last Christmas gift for man's regeneration! Yet, ungrateful man forgets Him! The Father from whom all our joys flow, the benefactor! Being to whom we owe every blessing of health and wealth and worldly prosperity—is left deserted in a darkened manger, whilst those He came to earth to save revel in the glare of luxurious pleasure!

Is this Christian gratitude to God? Was CHRISTMAS instituted solely as a time for pleasure, carnival and feasting? Have we Christians no duties that we owe to that

> "FATHER OF ALL! in every age,
> In every clime adored,
> By saint, by savage and by sage,
> Jehovah, Jove, Lord!"

Are we nineteenth century Christians to become the imitators of those innkeepers of Bethlehem who had no room for the Son of God in their habitations? Or, should we not rather emulate the conduct of those favored shepherds to whom the angel of the Lord appeared and announced to them this message direct from the Messiah:

> "Fear not; for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, that shall be to all the people: for this day is born to you a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord, in the City of David."

And what did the Shepherd's do on that first Christmas morning? They hastened to find God, and—having found and adored Him—they returned home, glorifying and praising God for all the wonders they had heard and seen! Such is the example set before us Christians in the Sacred Word of God for our edification on Christmas Day. He was to the poor and unlettered Shepherds that Almighty God sent His heavenly messenger, so that they should be the first to learn the "glad tidings" and the first to receive an audience from the new-born King!

And who were the next visitors to the Blessed Babe of Bethlehem? The Wisdom of God jealously seyies those who were the next visitors to Christ Child. Learned men, a band of superior intelligence, had their wise men found the humble and obscure dwelling-place of the Son of God, and, entering therein, they bended the knee and adored Him: and—opening their treasures—they offered Him gifts, gold, frankincense and myrrh!

What lessons do these two episodes teach us Christians of the nineteenth century? The visit of the Shepherds teaches us that the poor are the people of God, and that we—like them—should pay our first visit on Christmas morning to the Child of the Infant Christ and there offer to Him the grandest gift that Almighty God gave—an humble and a contrite heart!

Every Catholic should emulate the Shepherds on Christmas morning. God's angel—in the shape of His Church—has been re-echoing the beautiful canticle of great joy throughout the nineteen centuries that have elapsed since the dawn of that CHRISTMAS when the Christ-Child, Saviour, Redeemer, and she says to every erring sinner—to every Christian, yes, to every Christian—to every sinner, not, for I bring you glad tidings of great joy, for this day is born to you a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord!

You will find this "great joy" in the Confessional, where—like the Shepherds—you will leave behind you all your earthly cares and anxieties, all the transgressions of your past life, and you will rise up from the leprosy of sin a clean and beautiful Christian in the sight of God! You will find this joy again, when you present yourself in the posture of adoration before the Crib where rests the Redeemer of the World. Tears of joy will well up into your eyes, and the pulsations of your heart will beat with accelerated delight as you ponder upon the goodness of God in thus selecting you, out of millions in the world, to be one of His chosen visitors whose contrite and humble heart He will never despise!

There are none so poor as those who have no heart for God. Man may be accounted millionaire in worldly wealth, yet he nothing more than gilded pauper in the sight of our Father in Heaven. It is those rich wise men who seek out our Blessed Lord in the person of the poor, the sick, the orphaned, and the distressed—and present to them—His same—their gold, frankincense and myrrh, thus are acceptable to God as His alumers on earth.

Who is to that representa God in the eyes of all faithful Christians? In the priest who is the steward of the graces God sends us through the sacraments, the priest who is the custodian of God's blessings, and whose hand, heart and hands are consecrated to the sole service of that King of Kings and Lord of Lords! To him, therefore, go, if you would find the Infant Saviour. To him offer that humble and contrite heart which will make you worthy to be in the company of Mary and Joseph, the Shepherds and the Magi—around the Crib where hung lily rests the Lord who rules both heaven and earth! To the priest bring your Christmas gifts for God. He is the Shepherd of your soul, and to him are entrusted the lonely orphaned lambs of Christ's flock, and to him go the sorrowing widow and the homeless wanderer. He has been sent to replenish at Christmas so that God's tabernacle may be suitably adorned to typify the through celestial joy which all the faithful feel as the spirit of faith they hear upon the holy Christmas morn the anthems chanted by the angelic choir on the natal day of our Saviour's birth.

"Glory to God in the Highest and Peace on Earth to Men of Good Will."

No reader can appreciate in its fullest extent the full force of this heaven expressed benediction. "Peace on earth to men of good will," save that truly happy Catholic who has received Holy Communion on Christmas morning! His joy partakes of that celestial character which is only vouchsafed to those whose delight never rises above the transitory joys of temporal pleasure. By his visit to God's Church, in obedience to her precept, he has proved himself to be "a man of good will," and to such as him Almighty God has promised that peace of soul which the world cannot give, and that happiness of heart which comes to all who worship God in the spirit of penitential humility.

Let every reader of the MONITOR, therefore, bring a Christmas gift to God on next Friday week. Help you pastor to enlarge God's House and to beautify his sanctuary. Present your gift to your pastor to be a representative, so that he may support his parish school, his orphanage, or carry out other works of charity which daily encompass his thoughts.

All you possess in the world belongs to God, and to Him at least may you return a portion of the property he has conferred on you. You are healthy whilst others are sick, you are prosperous whilst others are poor, you have a happy home whilst others—unhappy just as deserving—are wanderers upon God's earth with no room for them in the time of the wide, wide world! Ponder on these things and ask yourself this question How am I better than my sick, my poor, my indigent neighbor, that God should bless me so far above them? Then let the gratitude of your heart manifest itself in the bestowal of a munificent alms upon your pastor—and your Christmas cup of joy will be filled to overflowing. Your daily load of turmoil will be lifted from your shoulders, your home will look more cheerful, your children will look more beautiful, and in your heart of hearts you will feel the premonitions of that holy joy which filled the souls of heaven as the voices of both Cherubim and Seraphim resounded throughout all space, singing—

"Glory to God in the Highest and Peace on Earth to Men of Good Will."

A Renegade Rebuked.

There are many young men and women on this coast who are Catholics by birth but who do not place any particular value on

> "Our birthright is the birthright of a king,
> Our birthright is the birthright of a king,
> Our birthright is the birthright of a king,
> Our birthright is the birthright of a king."

partial way—the religious duty—Catholics would not have parted with for all the wealth in the world. Such young men and such young women may be led to reflect upon their cowardly and criminal attitude by reading the following account of an address delivered by a renegade Catholic young lady, who was at one time Minister of State in Holland. During his official term he one day received a young applicant in quest of favor. The visitor was a young lady, but when she learned that he was a Catholic by birth, "as the recipient's reply, "but I will not say my prayers!"

Then Moddermun, with magisterial gravity, admonished her to him this solemn rebuke. "I can find no applicant unfit for you. You were born and reared up in the Catholic Church, the grandest institution on the world, and you don't know how to appreciate that! I feel sure that a man who never so more by his faith is not fit to serve his king, seeing that he does not know how to serve his God.

This man who thus rebuked this young renegade Catholic was a very earnest Christian, yet he was—and—he knew—the value of his Catholic religion, and had utter contempt for those thoughtless and Judas Catholics who blush at their holy faith, and who are ready at any moment to sell it to the world for "thirty pieces of silver." If young Catholics who are positivisms regarding their faith, could only realize how low they fall even in the eyes of non Catholics whenever they evince a cowardly shame concerning their religion, they would suffer death before they would have recourse to the first step towards the loss of God.

What is it to lose Catholic faith? It is to fling back in the face of Almighty God the greatest and most valuable gift He could bestow on man. It is to spurn the sacraments which God gave us whereby to save our souls. It is to deny the Son of God before men, and to have Him deny us before His Father in Heaven. It is to sell for a filthy mess of the world's pottage the precious heritage which God gave us, which our forefathers fought, bled and died for, and without which there would not be a Christian on earth or a saint in heaven!

The loss of Catholic faith means the loss of God as our Father; the loss of the Saviour as our Brother; the loss of the Blessed Virgin as our Mother; the loss of the saints in heaven as our kinsfolk, and the loss of eternal happiness for our own souls! And what do we barter away our blessed faith for? In order to bind our souls in the service of Satan, to be his bond slaves and in an eternity of perdition! What Catholic will not pause ere he plunges into such a pitfall? Then, let us beg of our youthful Catholics who are in the least wavering in the fault to come back body and soul to their dear Mother during this Christmas season. Visit the Crib which represes the Infant Saviour, and with the penitent one of the thief on the Cross, or the tears of Mary Magdalen, ask Him to receive you again into His Sacred Heart, and in great you the grace to repine Christ in the hour of your death!

"Without faith," says St. Paul, "it is impossible to please God." Yet this in the precious Heavens sent be to which so many thoughtless young men and women think of such little consequence as to be ready to barter it off for some temporal advantage or to cast it off as something defiling and degrading to appear they are in non Catholic society. Do such young people ever reflect that in thus designing God and discarding His religion, they virtually cut themselves off from the protection of the Blessed Mother of God and all the angels and saints in heaven? Do they ponder on the fact that they give up God and rangs themselves on the side of Satan! We think and hope that thoughtlessness alone causes them thus to jeopardize their souls, and we pray that these lines may serve as a beacon light to warn some of them against this foolish act of religious suicide.

Missionary Work Accomplished by the Monitor.

In order that the numerous friends of the MONITOR may share in the pleasure we feel in knowing that this paper is doing good missionary work for the holy cause of God's Church, we append a few of the many encomiums which we have recently received from bishops, priests, men and women of the world, who have read the MONITOR and our colleagues in the cause of Catholic faith and civil rights.

The Catholic press can be made a wonderful and forcible propagator of God's truth if Catholics themselves will only give it the generous encouragement, the prompt patronage and that wide circulation which any literary enterprise undertaken for the propagation of our holy faith deserves. We hope, therefore, that the MONITOR's friends everywhere will continue to help us in this good work, by their literary contributions, their encouraging expressions, and their influence, so as to make the MONITOR the vehicle through which our faith will rejoice that they are with in Christ's fold, and through which many others may see the light of God's truth as it is set forth for them in the many attractive ways which God adapts in order to lead men to eternal salvation.

BY THEIR FRUITS YE SHALL KNOW THEM.

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR—

Dear Sir—As a lovely and fragrant specimen of the divine fruit which blooms and ripens within the heart of those through whose mouth the Spirit of God speaks, I send you the following extract from a letter of a young virtuous, but very pleasant girl to a mutual friend. Such letters are the fruits which come to my notice through the confidence of a dear friend. The writer is quite a young accomplished lady—unfortunately for the welfare of her soul—greatly inclined to follow the fashions which leads to eternal death through the fascinating gateways of indifferentism. It appears that, after he had read the account of the extraordinary conversion of the arch infidel, Leo Taxil, as given by the MONITOR, he formed a resolution to read the paper, and, if he found it worth the price, he would take it up regularly within his naturally good heart and educated mind, but, alas! for human weakness, the noble resolution, which weighed so heavily upon the poor fallen human nature, seemed to melt away, and the engaging darkness of the Evil One was gathering close around him.

With a sigh of utter helplessness he sought the relief from the sorrow of his soul, by throwing aright, without having recourse to the Sacrament of Penance, the load of sin, the sense, small plaintive wave of the last resolution he had made, and, lo! the light of God's mercy shone upon him, and he felt the weight of despair, in which she was the horrid, whose sin, and the sweet, sweet, sweet,

THE WEEP.

IRISH.—The wild of a Gypsy who died where the Pyramids lie;
Sadly she was embedded with stars, and her bell
In the dreles, right wondrous to see; and she lived in the days when our Lord was a child
On his Mother's immaculate breast;
Where he fed from his cup—where to Egypt exiled,
He went down with St. Joseph the blest.

This Requiem had someone sung single nothinks,
And the future was given to her gage,
For an obelisk marked her abode, and a sphinx
On her threshold kept vigil always.

She was pensive, and retire alone, nor was seen
In the haunts of the dissolute crowd;
But commoned with the ghosts of the Pharaohs, I ween,
Or with visitors wrapped in a shroud.

And there came an old man from the desert one day,
With a mind on a mule by that road;
And a child on her bosom reclined—and the way
Led him straight to the Gypsy's abode;
And they seemed to have traveled a weariness from their home many, many a league—
From a tyrant's pursuit, from an enemy's wrath,
Spent with toil and o'ercome with fatigue.

And the Gypsy came forth from her dwelling and prayed
That the pilgrims would rest them awhile;
And she offered her couch to that delicate maid
Who had come many, many a mile;
And she fondled the babe with affection's caress,
And she begged the old man would repose;
"Here the stranger," she said, "ever finds free access,
And the weary have balm for his woes."

Then her guests from the glare of the noonday she led
To a cool but grotto so cool;
Where she spread them a banquet of fruits—and a shed
With a manger, she found for the mule;
With the wine of the Palm-Tree, with the dates newly culled
All the toil of the road she beguiled;
And with song in a language mysterious, she lulled
On her bosom the wayfaring child.

When the Gypsy seen in her Eldrop hand,
Placed the infant's distressed pain,
Oh, 'twas fearful to see, how the features
she scanned
Of the babe in his slumbers so calm!
While she noticed and marked every furrow that crossed
O'er the tableau of Destiny's line;
"Whence come ye?" she cried, in astonishment lost,
"For this child is of lineage divine!"

"From the village of Nazareth," Joseph replied,
"Where we dwelt in the land of the Jew,
We have fled from a tyrant whose purposes are dyed
In the gore of the children he slew.
We are bold to remain, till an angel's command
Shall apprise us the hour to return;
But till then we inhabit the foreigner's land,
And in Egypt he sends our sojourn."

"Then ye tarry with me?" cried the Gypsy in joy,
"And ye make of my dwelling your home;
Long years have I prayed that the Israelite boy,
(Blessed hope of the Gentiles) would come.
And she kissed both the feet of the Infant and knelt
And adored him at once;—then a shade
Of the face of the mother—she cheerfully dwelt
With her host on the banks of the Nile.

NEVADA CITY, Cal., Dec. 2, 1885.

Dear Pat—On reaching Colfax we were hailed by our friend Wiley Goldsmith in his characteristic style. Goldsmith is the owner of a ranch and dwelling that followed the English enclosures in the Ireland of long ago. Almost 40 miles above Sacramento, through the great cross mountainous country that traverses the gold region and is intersection roads and with a self-sufficient air of independence, the prosperity of his neighbor, a name dear to all Irish hearts—it is the magic one of "Anderson." Goldsmith is an phlebotomy, the visitor now before him was a handful of bones and a pair of bright eyes, while everywhere on every side evidences of his industry and success from deeply down to where he had taken values from every stone and alluvial heap and foam and also a fabled rehash in their purching time to the sea. But wait, that he not will you cement one about a mile long which around and away back, a long distance, with pretty residences and handsome buildings lining the way, till you come abruptly upon an opening in what appears to be a veritable town of moderate, lively growth with stores, and all the appurtenances and belongings thereto. This is Auburn. Here is the seat of the county government and business and set down, as it were, in the great, but not unkempt and unlovely, Sierra Nevada, however, between Goldsmith's Auburn of the plain in its liberality of perfection and loveliness and the rural splendors of Ireland, and the unsystematic spot of that name by the Golden shores of the Pacific, we as yet and for months to be the dry and immensity of the coast that rolls between the divergent spheres whereon they dwell.

Instead of looking upon the loveliest village of the plain decorated and decorated by the fairest hand of Old Erin and industry, the eye comes upon one of California's mountain towns with its rude and primitive appearance, and yet very born in the promotion of that "health and plenty" of which our cherished poet sings in the cold, "a place, in fact, where all sorts and sights and sizes abide and dwell forever. Over the bridge, on the further extremity of the town, is a lovely view of hill and slope, mound and valley, dense and rivulet, that is enchanting to behold.

DOLPAN, THE REST STATION.

is a small bury of few homes and little important. A brand here, however, runs from here to Green Valley, and Nevada, which holds out big opportunities, and is connected with Railroad travel and night coming generally. A call upon the venerable Father Dolpan of Green Valley who has passed the greater part of his life in Mississippi Valley among the mission centers of the great till the long roll of years seems no longer to be a burden, and who hoards at times at the Dolan house, not with a response as hearty as it was spontaneous, but with a cordiality that no any Father Dolpan's, and no parochial residence during my stay there.

The hall of 12 Sisters (some of whom came to California in 1852) to look after the manifold duties pertaining to their calling as educators of our people and wards of the homeless and friendless child. The foundation stone was laid in 1867, and ten years later it was incorporated under the laws of the State of California, the people recognizing as the years advanced the importance and usefulness of such an institution in their midst. Opposite on a green patch sloping away towards the Creek flowing through Rodeo valley, is the Catholic Cemetery. A visit within its hallowed precincts is All Souls Day I felt, must be fitting, if not somewhat interesting—the Byrne, Byrne-Hickey, Ford, Meagher, English and other dear ones quietly noticeable for their costly make-up and tasteful adornment. A plain wooden cross over a heart shaped mound with no other decoration save a drooping wreath of the choicest of the paradise, bore the simple inscription "Sister Felix Carr."

AT STATE CITY.

I met many staunch friends of the Monitor, among others Mr. H. Neville, one of Trench Brothers, who, with his family, I hope to visit till the "grand old Monitor" for all time. Also Messrs. M. Hanley, J. Danielly and Mark Maslon, the latter of Green Valley and a true son of Erin, 30 miles from Nevada by stage, is

THE TOWN OF MARYSVILLE.

Its elevation is considerable, as that where with 5 miles of the town one can see the view of the Sacramento plains stretching away for miles and miles to the southeast. For all the hills that yesterday were sombre and bare were mountains emerald hight, the early rains giving new life and vitality to pasture and clothing the land in nature's modest robes of sweet refreshing beauty, then to Marysville the eye rests upon a scene of beauty that for scope and sublimity of conception is unequalled by any that came under my observation. It is enchantment complete.

THE TOWN HAS NOT AN ORIGINAL

irregular and representing, and is guarded by a lofty range of hills running far southwards on its eastern side, till the mountains of Yuba county where in well-defined scores of the Cross mounts round the curves of the land, while chaplets travel are pure purchase and adorn and adorn. Away across the Creek and across the town where the road winds up and around the hill till lost to view, is the little green graveyard, in which lies and monument sleeping helpless rest in the rays of the sun. Looking up and down over the broad and varying scenes, the eminence on the northern limit of the town where the ashes of Mr. T. Ryan remain to decorate the great cause in use, we obtain a view of the Sacramento Valley, and the Sierra Nevada. Yesterday we had left the lonely road and dwelling in the plentiful of a fadless glory and immortality. Low down where the plain and sheep and cows, are browsing by the ravine's precious brink, blooming gardens and orchards hedged enclosures pass out from among the trees like gems of fire-flashing emerald and ruby on darkest night.

ACROSS THE LANDSCAPE

and far beyond where the palatial residence of J. McNamara and where he lately retirement from the road, the winding sinuous, with shadows is lighting up hill and valley, the green stream, spire and home-top in a flood of mellow light. To a pretty scene, truly, "Coming a road by the school-house and over a wooden bridge that lands westward, a strange, grim sight is presented to our gaze, filling one with wonder and reminiscence of the bright days of gold, it may be, by many a miner's lorry cable. This is the high, diagonal cables running down deep into the bowels of the earth, with its descent and ascent of the miners and ore, and the ore up to the surface, presenting a novel picture of the land for miles, and filling the mind with strangely fascinating reminiscence as ever move along, all of which are in sharp contrast with the quite scene above of bright sunlight, velvet lawns, sloping gardens and overhanging cliffs that look smilingly down from their mountain altitudes.

A pleasant chat with the Rev. Fathers O'Connell, Brosnan of Stockton, and a call upon Mr. Ryan, the Sheriff, completed the round of Sutter's visit at that locality, rendered a very pleasing and profitable trip through S. P. R. California. Respectfully yours,

CATHOLIC AFFAIRS IN STOCKTON.

STOCKTON, Cal., Dec. 7, 1885.

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR—

Dear Sir—The cold, dark days of winter are fast drawing upon us in Stockton, as in most all other places at this time of the year. The rains of the weather for the past month has been cold and damp, with considerable rain of late during the latter part of November. Never, during my previous years, has so much rain fallen, or there has the season, for this time of the year, been so cold and damp as it has been this year, and if it don't rain sooner, as he is in the habit of January the rain will not until the middle of January, and then it will commence and continue for six or seven days and then cease and all other work suspended. And it is this season and wish of all that the season of rest will be a productive one. That work has been suspended for one full day now is either from the fact that the rain has not been sufficient to allow the farmers to have sufficient of their seed in the ground to warrant working up and down the streets trying to obtain work, but, alas, it is the misery of the poor, and one and the field in large, work of course, will be power and there will be a great deal of employment for laborers. However, we will be have to wait, for we know that God who never forgets the needy, will in his goodness reward us with plenty of everything. The business will be greatly benefitted by the rain, and persons have been, and are now, making money, and there is no one who has been unemployed for the past year who has been even tolerably prosperous. The rain has not made its appearance here for over a week, and the mornings and evenings are chilly and cold. I could write further on this and many other matters, but as it is my intention to send a communication to the Monitor in a few weeks, that will be of much importance, especially for our new society here, I will close my present with a request that you will kindly publish the above, and oblige

Yours truly,

REV. CORNELIUS SHEEHY.

CATHOLIC SCHOOLS IN UTAH.

Academy of the Sacred Heart at Ogden. The Franciscan Brothers at Salt Lake.

Writing from Ogden to the Salt Lake Tribune, a correspondent says:

In this city are a great deal in said of education, and parents allow to the necessity of educating their children almost seem to be oversight in the selection of a school in which to train them. Not so with the Catholics, who appreciate of the necessity of the education of their children, and, as said, "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it."

Parents are not over solicitous in the matter of the education of their children, for alone we are comfortable and prosperous, and the education not based on the principles of Christianity cannot aid us in the world which be good and faithful citizens, in the true sense of the term, or to make us good and faithful citizens.

Education must teach the young and make them good citizens, or they are not free from all moral responsibilities, from all accountability to any power, and are dangerous to society, and not imposed by Christianity. Such an education does the above named institution claim to afford its pupils.

Being Catholic, Catholic children are taught that the only support of private and public virtue is religion, and are trained in those principles which religion alone introduces and sustains. Whilst no influence is brought to bear on any other religious beliefs, the Sisters, those female daughters of education and zealous guardians of youthful minds, are anxious that their charges be good and true citizens, faithful, devoted and obedient children of God and of the State, and women and accomplished young ladies. To they teach, not by precept, but by example, the sacred art and, every day, living examples in the minds of the pupils, of woman's brightest sphere, of woman's greatest adornment—modesty, purity. From the day a pupil enters the Academy of the Sacred Heart, she lives in an atmosphere of pure morality, and is taught to be the proud lady of grace, of dignity, and of refinement in every movement.

Moral and intellectual education is made so prominent as to the inculcation of morality, as the Sisters are, as a rule, well educated and accomplished ladies, and are competent to teach these. This branch, decidedly difficult and complicated, is not the only one they are competent to teach by the use of a complete chemical apparatus. This school, the only one, we believe, in the Territory, that teaches the children by means of other instruments to illustrate in a practical way the principles of chemistry.

It was highly satisfactory to the teacher to notice the ease and self-composure with which the young ladies exhibited the principles and laws of chemistry and performed the several experiments.

DANGER IN GAS STOVES.

The Horrible Scene Which Miss Gertie Marmon Saw.

When Gertie Harmon, of Erie, Pa., went to her room in Kennedy street, early Saturday morning, a frightful scene awaited her. She had finished her work in the family of E. Wolf, on Twelfth street, and had come home to dress for church. Finding the blinds closed and the room locked she became greatly alarmed and forcing a window entered into the house. A terrible fascinated her, almost robbing her of her senses, but found herself in her parents' bedroom.

GERTIE'S NERVE

met her gaze. On the side of the bed lay her mother with one limb hanging from the bed and her head pillowed on a chair. She was cold and apparently dead. Near the foot of the bed lay her father, with his face black and swollen, his pipe and face were blue and bloated and his eyes fixed. He breathed slightly. Overcome by the frightened and almost suffocated girl gave the alarm.

MRS. CONRAD SEYFER

responded, and as she approached the humble home of the Harmons she divined the cause of the trouble at once. The gas had escaped from a stove in the sitting room, which the affrighted daughter had left open.

Quickly every door open and every window up, Mrs. Seyfer let in a volume of fresh air and then ran to the room where the unfortunate victims of the stove which stowed from the stove which stood in the sitting room, while messengers rushed off for physicians. The first one found was sent for, Dr. Usler was first upon the grounds and Dr. Sillim an arrived soon afterwards. The old people were found to be asphyxiated.

ASPHYXIATED

Dr. Usler, who is a young man, and a son of the old family while Dr. Sillimon looked after the old people. Steady was introduced hypodermically, and other means of resuscitation resorted to, and after the lapse of two hours of labor Dr. Sillimon succeeded in bringing the couple in the hands of Dr. Usler, who had labored for the period from, but not until he had endured all the agonies of a long and painful death, the old couple lay breathing stertorously and unconscious.

STORY OF LIFE.

Toward evening Mrs. Harmon began to show signs of life and at 9 o'clock at night was able to talk a little. She said in a disconnected way that she had retired at about midnight and was awakened by a terrible pain in her stomach. She did not detect the smell of gas. Mrs. Harmon, who is 70 years of age, is a humble and has been for years. She thinks the cause of the trouble was the fact that she had left the door open, which allowed the affrighted daughter had left open.

Mr. Harmon, who is 75 years of age, Mrs. Seyfer let in a volume of fresh air and then ran to the room where the unfortunate victims of the stove which stood

THE WEEK'S

IRISH FAILTHE, "gay Christmas!"
Coming all Nature seems glad,
Thy festival duly be honor,
Though a robe of pure whiteness is clad,
The Frost King, thy advent to welcome,
Thy path o'er the waters did pave
With bright, sparkling diamonds, collected
From mine in the river of rain.

The blank on thy cheek brightly glows,
And thy smile is serene as the morne,
Though the blast of rough winter we blow,
The icicle sceptre thou bearest,
Thy subjects may bind 'neath its sway;
But the kingly profusion thou spreadest
Doth peace in thy empire display.

"CEAD MILE FAILTHE," gay Christmas!
Thy bounties abundantly pour,
And cheer by the smile the poor pilgrims
Who roam on this isle beam-kissed,
May the star which directed the Magi
Enlighten our earthly career,
And guide us to Heaven, our country,
For we are but wanderers here.

"A hundred thousand welcomes."

OUR IRISH LETTER.

Freedom's Sun Gilding the Green Hills of Erin.—The Battle of the Ballot-box.—Great Victory Anticipated through the Votes of the Irish People.—The Issue between the Whigs and Tories.—The Orange-dom Dazed in the North, Etc., Etc.

[FROM OUR REGULAR IRISH CORRESPONDENT.]

My country! famous land and tyrant-hatred,
The lot hath been so evil that we long
Yet hear thee hence thy gallant, pride unsatiated,
Till right has triumphed over wrong.
Not all in vain the martyr sons have perished,
Not all in vain the patriot hearts have bled,
Thou glorious earth, thy heritage be known shortlisted,
When shall unquenched it rage.

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR:

Dear Sir—The week before I have had to the post to communicate many a sad and tale of oppression and suffering, of the land of Erin's thralldom, the home of their heart. But, thank God, these scenes have at last changed, and I am to-day the fortunate harbinger of happy tidings from long-suffering Erin to her greatly-loving sons and daughters across the wave. The very sky has passed away. We have the sunlight of Ireland, shining upon more to herald the dawn of a magnificent truth—the truth that our long and fervent prayers—long have poor—have at last—been heard and answered. The long, long night of dark days of the prison-cloud that may still hang on the battle ground when the signal shot of Irish victory is heard.

THE DAY HAS COME AT LAST

for which generations of Irish heroes have panted. When the Irish people, with one voice, shall speak enough to the end the curse of the ballot, shall triumph so be dominant in the world's history. The issue would result of our struggles is not, however, possible, unless the Nationalists would fail into a deadly delay at the present election time and allow the enemy to fasten his fangs on some parts of the country where he might be able to retain a position, through representation of false friends, to the cause of the Nation's cause. Our foes have not, however, base enough to adopt the efforts to raise the spirit of jealousy or division over the choice of our candidates in some boroughs where it would be so easy for them to gain over enough to have an inroad made in our ranks. Our foes with one accord have gathered around the Irish vote. Politicians are showing great anxiety for the vote, for the possession of which they are so well they have been in hope for it in the past. We, being absentees, are fond of telling the first opportunity they have got of asserting their inalienable rights, through Irish National Leagues representatives.

THE VOTE ONCE HAS STRUCK, and the figure shall be delivered at the Irish ballot-box, which is to be the grave of the old party Irish peasantry. Our enthusiasm about vote up to all our politic allies of every shade, from the Irish lower and upper, lay-clinging, who from the shoes of disturbed landlords opposition appeared to many a gloomy epoch, shall see her take a forced place among the nations. Our sons are turned from activity manner. What a glorious consummation! Ireland's sons and daughters, dead years—victory without bloodshed. Surely the millions will not longer necessarily to our Irish spirit crowd. That weapon of patriotism and liberty, the ballot, freedom from the tyranny of landlords and bigotry, and has evoked all the energies of our people, and has created a spirit of patriotism of Ireland from Connemara to Cape Clear.

THE MARKET SETTING SOUTH—THE TORIES OF ULSTER

to withstand the on polling day appear to be in a state of panic. Their leaders are anxious for the Nationalists that these two parties contest some in a dozen after all their bombast about a coalition, and the champion of some Tories in a most side letter to the Nationalists of Ulster by the rebels. Happily, the spirit of the Irish Catholic is not to be legally British as a proud lion into tent brothers across the Channel. Ireland's sons, by their patriotic fidelity for the sake of the "integrity of Ireland," have a name, and not alter the Tories, and we may well say in such fidelity, "Ireland's sons are true." Ireland's sons are true." Ireland's sons are true."

OVER THE WAY—A CHRISTMAS HYMNE.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

You would never have known it was winter,
The house was so cosy and warm,
So sheltered from wind and from weather
So safe from the heat of the storm;
And the very dumb children whistled
All flushed with their frolic and play,
Were as different as children could be,
From the little one over the way.

Their shoes were on white as the snow drifts
The curtains were drawn to shut out the
And the red south window and door,
A blaze on the hearth broken Roar,
Oh! cosy and bright the room looked
When the fire in the stove is gone,
When flakes hit the window pane,
And the street is as cold as a so.

Sometimes the cosy and the
Sometimes the cosy and the
Sometimes the cosy and the

Editorial Notes.

—The Holy Father has appointed Cardinals Malchers, Mascotti and Vergas as members of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda for Oriental Affairs. By letter of the Secretary of State, the Holy Father has constituted his Eminence Cardinal Schiaffino a member of the Sacred Congregation of Rites.

—The College of the Propaganda announces that up to November 1st, in the vicariate of Cochin China, 9 missionaries, 7 native priests, 60 catechists, 270 members of religious orders and 2,000 Christians were massacred; 200 parishes, 17 orphan asylums and 10 convents were destroyed, and 226 churches were burned.

—True to their anti-Irish traditions, the Oranges of the North of Ireland are making England out to great Home Rule, but the influence of that iniquitous body has been recently buried beneath the ballots of the Nationalists, and all honest people will pray that it may never be resurrected.

—The Catholics of Lubeck recently asked the Municipality for a grant of money towards the erection of a new Church, which is absolutely required for the needs of the population. They met with a curt refusal. Yet the same municipality has voted 2,200 marks for a Jewish Synagogue, and 900 marks annually for the

—In Nebraska wool get a foot of land in exchange for $6 an acre to-day, and in Wyoming sage brush grows in price. Bishop Bond thinks that if the wealthy Irish representatives in Congress would purchase land in Kansas, it would increase their stock in the Republican party, and most profitable investment they could make. There is no question but that the land should not increase in price until it reaches $75 an acre.

—From the statistics of the diocese of Cologne, we learn that there have been 45 deaths among the clergy during the present year, and that 350 parishes are vacant. Witness the passing of the Kulturkampf Bill 440 priests have died, not counting the numbers of Religious Orders. Thirteen hundred priests are on duty, and of these 160 are over 70 years old. The archdiocese numbers 812 parishes, not reckoning chapels, &c., and 2,000,000 Catholics.

—From our foreign exchanges we learn that Signor Depretis has resigned on Signor Rensei Pasquali of Turin to withdraw his grotesque counter-conspiracy which was to have been published under the patronage of the Freemasons of Northern Italy. M. Paul Devoulle, the so-called President of the Leagues of Patriots, suggests that the right to vote should be taken away from the French clergy. The Bishop of Bailey has received the blessing of the Holy Father and a letter encouraging him in his efforts to obtain the beatification of the Curé d'Ars.

—News comes from Chili that the vexed question of the appointment of Bishops to the See of Santiago, and other vacant Sees, has been finally settled. On the instance of the National Festival of Chili, a telegram was received from Monsignor Monciel congratulating the people of the Republic on this appointment. It is said that Don Mariano Casanova, who was for a long time Roman Catholic Governor and quasi Bishop of Valparaise, is appointed Archbishop of Santiago; Don Rian Canas, Bishop of La Conception; and a Dominican, Father Lorenzo, Bishop of Chiloe.
